Softball splits a pair with Temple

Owls snap UMass' 11 game winning streak

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

UMass' Holly Aprile (above) was as hot on the mound as at the plate, registering her 14th win this past weekend.

This team has not had the luxury of looking past anything, not the next game, inning, or pitch. Anything. Meanwhile, the University of Massachusetts softball team (23-15) has played itself into position to bully through the Atlantic 10 tournament a couple of weeks down the road, and dare we say, earn a bid to the NCAA's?

Ask catcher Cherie DellAnno, who put it succinctly, "we want to get back."

The Minutewomen stand this morning at 23-15, and in second place in the A-10 with a record of 8-2 following a Sunday split at Temple. UMass dropped the Owls 6-5 in the opener to extend their winning streak to 11 games, then lost the second game of the day 2-1.

After standing in a slight drizzle through two innings on Saturday, a planned doubleheader with St. Joeseph's was scrapped. The Minutewomen then came out a bit rusty against the Owls the next day, according to coach Elaine Sortino.

"It took us a while to get going... it showed up mostly in our defensive execution. We were not sharp," she said.

Be it fatigue, the team's adopted flu bug, nerves, rust or whatever, UMass carried a 1-0 lead in the final inning of the second game before giving the win away. With one out, Temple's Lauren Walko singled. Lefty Deb Swantek ripped a triple to right field, tying the score.

The next batter put the ball in play to third base, where Chris Collins scooped it up and threw the ball across the diamond to teammate Jen Vaillencourt at first base. Swantek scored the game winning run as the ball was in flight.

"As soon she [Collins] threw the ball, the kid broke home," described Sortino.

Holly Aprile threw the opener for UMass, improving to 14-8. Temple had jumped out to a 1-0 lead in the bottom of the first off Aprile, sandwiching a pair of singles around a sacrifice bunt. But in the top of the second, UMass seiz-

Softball to host Vermont

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

This afternoon's planned doubleheader with the University of Vermont (Totman, 3 p.m.) finds the University of Massachusetts softball team entering the last lap of its home schedule. Following today's pair, Adelphi's visit a week from now will close out the regular season.

The Atlantic 10 tournament follows, assuming that UMass will still be standing at that point as one of the top four teams in the league. Since it's currently 8-2 in the league, a tourney berth is a pretty good bet.

The bigger prize is an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament. UMass is peaking at the right time, heading into today's games as winners of 11 of their last 12. But to see the light of NCAA play, things are going to have to break thier way through the final two weeks of the season.

The first step, of course, is to win. Today, this week, and thereafter ("we can't lose to them," said coach Elaine Sortino). The Lady Catamounts bring a 16-14 record to Amherst, having most recently split a doubleheader with the University of Maine on Sunday.

Vaccinate not evacuate: men's tennis will travel to CCSU despite measles 'outbreak'

By KIM BRATER
Collegian Correspondent

Measles anyone? Instead of tennis, this may be what the University of Massachusetts men's tennis team will be asking when it walks onto the courts today to face Central Connecticut State University. Apparently there has been a recent outbreak of the measles on the CCSU campus.

"All of our tennis players and all of our athletes have been vaccinated," said Brad Bower, assistant athletic director at CCSU.

According to Bower, as a precaution, "the only sporting event to be cancelled was a softball double-header, this past Saturday. [But], there have been indoor cultural events that have been cancelled as a result of the outbreak."

UMass coach Manny Roberts said measles are not be the factor. "We will be heading down to Connecticut today, weather permitting. The doctors and trainers have done their check-ups and all players have their immunizations."

The 'outbreak' is not as big as it may seem, but it is serious and CCSU is taking precautions to prevent it from spreading.

"UMass is ready to come down and play. As for the measles, it won't come into it," said Bower.

UMass will travel to the Blue Devil's home turf for today's 3 p.m. match.

The Minutemen's record thus far is five wins and three losses.

Baseball goes Bear hunting

Minutemen travel to Maine for doubleheader

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team may be out of the playoffs but it still wants to play the rest of its games with as much effort as it normally would.

After getting swept by the Owls of Temple University this past weekend, post-season hopes were dashed, but the remaining nine games for the Minutemen will be played in an effort to earn some respectability and end the year on a high note.

UMass will be travelling into Black Bear territory today in a doubleheader against the University of Maine. This is provided, of course, that it does not get rained out. Maine Sports Information Director Leonard Harlow said that the weather forecast was for rain all day but that the decision to play would be made by 7 a.m. today.

If the Minutemen do play, it will be against a team that has already locked up the ECAC championship with a 12-0 conference record and a 27-21 record overall. The Bears are led by a pair of hard hitting outfielders in freshman Mark Sweeney (.379, 6 home runs and 36 runs batted in) and senior Don Hutchinson (.378, 31 RBIs) along with some excellent young pitching.

If UMass is to stand a chance, there are a number of things that must improve. One that has been gnawing at coach Mike Stone's mind has been hitting in the clutch. Over the weekend the Minutemen left 29 men on base in four games. This may not sound like much but it was often the case of multiple men, often in scoring position with one or nobody out. Missed scoring opportunities killed UMass and wasted some good pitching performances, namely Paul Ciaglo's five-hitter and Brian Conroy's one-hitter.

One thing that also must improve is to cut down on the amount of errors committed, especially in the infield. The Minutemen had a string of 21 straight games with at least one error — which, thankfully, was broken during Conroy's game last Sunday. In 40 games UMass has 98 errors as compared to opponents' 60 errors and a subpar .927 fielding percentage. The infield has had no regular starter at any position other than freshman Glen DiSarcina at short.

Hopefully for UMass things will improve soon because Maine this time of year is a very inhospitable place.

Gorillas can't forget their a,'B,C's

Lesson No. 17 in sports: never look past an opponent.

With those machines from Syracuse on the horizon, that is the talk of the University of Massachusetts lacrosse world. How good is Syracuse? Can we beat Syracuse? Syracuse, Syracuse, Syracuse.

But the Gorillas can't afford to make any early preparations for Saturday, because Boston College comes to town this afternoon for a 3 p.m. clash at the Hill. It would be easy to overlook the Eagles, but the sixth-ranked Gorillas can ill-afford to jump the gun on the weekend.

UM coach Dick Garber has assured that his team's sole focus today will be on the Beagles, victims of an 18-4 bludgeoning last year down in Flutieville. But this is a different BC team.

"This is the best BC team in quite a while," Garber said. "But we have too much firepower for them."

At 5-7, BC has at least one gun in senior attack Bryan Stenberg, who has an eye-catching 43 goals and 11 assists. Junior Jim Bleakley, senior Chris Pascale and freshman Mark Gaffney are others to watch. Sophomore Mike Holland will be in net.

One side note is that the Birds haven't played before a raucous UMass crowd since 1985. Rain forced 1987's scheduled Amherst visit to be switched to BC's AstroConcrete field.

Gorilla Grumblings: There was a little jockeying in this week's USILA poll. Maryland dropped to seventh with a loss, moving North Carolina and Adelphi up a spot to fourth and fifth. Hopkins beat Navy, 7-5 to hold the top spot, and the Orange people ignored national power Penn — get this — 22-1 (yikes) to solidify number two. Loyola, at a weak-sistered 8-0 is third.

Duffey defends research

Refuses to abandon defense projects

By BETH GATELY

UMass Chancellor Joseph Duffey addressed students and faculty in the Cape Cod lounge yesterday concerning the Defense Department research controversy on campus.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey met with about 150 students, faculty members, and administrators yesterday in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union to answer questions concerning the controversial military-funded research issue at the University of Massachusetts.

Duffey said the administration and the Research Council of the Faculty Senate have reviewed the policy of the administration regarding military-funded research on campus.

He said the administration remains firm on its commitment to employ Defense Department research as long as it complies with the policy endorsed in 1972 by the Research Council.

The policy states the University will enter into a grant or research project when the purpose, scope, and results of the research can be fully and freely disclosed.

"I don't negotiate with students [on the research issue]," Duffey said.

Protesters posed several demands to the administration last week. Among them was the demand that all Defense Department research on campus be abandoned.

"Some things are not negotiable with students, and the research policy is one thing," Duffey said, as the clouds lifted and the first signs of sun appeared after a miserably rainy day. "We can listen and consult with students, but we won't accept demands."

"We don't want to end research on campus, but we don't want it to be tied to the D.O.D.," said Frank Bowrys, one of the seven protesters who was arrested in Marcus Hall two weeks ago.

Duffey said a lot of people in the community are concerned about the conversion question. He said he would suggest to the Research Council of the Faculty Senate that some awards to faculty and graduate students be granted by the University for research in conversion.

Conversion refers to a change from military-funded research to more socially responsible subjects like solar power, according to Terisa Turner a UMass faculty member in the women's studies and social thought and political economy departments.

TAs call two-day protest at Whitmore a success

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The halls of the Whitmore Administration Building yesterday were clogged by about 120 class sections which were held held in the culmination of a two-day protest by teaching assistants opposing heavy workloads, low wages, and state budget cuts.

The "teach out," which was held from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. during scheduled class hours, forced all classes indoors because of rain, but organizers said the 200 TAs and hundreds of undergraduates were undaunted by the conditions.

"We fit everyone in the corridors. There was plenty of room," said Seth Rothberg, a TA in the English writing program.

Although only 15 percent of the 1,700 graduate student TAs turned out for the protest, philosophy TA Angela Curran said the demonstration was successful because many TAs do not have classes scheduled on Monday and Tuesday.

"We think we could've doubled the number [of classes held]" if the protest was continued throughout the week, Curran said. "We felt there was a lot of goodwill among staff members."

TA salaries, which average below $6,500 a year, are among the lowest in the Northeast, Rothberg said, ridiculing Chancellor Joseph Duffey's statement made during a noon rally on Monday that TA stipends have risen 103 percent in the past seven years.

"103 percent of nothing is still nothing," he said, adding that the stipends remain low while the area's cost of living is on the rise.

Rothberg said the threat of losing 260 discussion class sections next semester because of budget cuts demonstrates the need for TAs to form a union to protect themselves from pay cuts and layoffs.

"The administration now knows we are not happy with the situation," he said. "They can't come up with these hair-brained solutions to problems without consulting us first."

The 600 member Graduate Employees Organization, which largely sponsored the protest, is part of an ongoing attempt to unionize the TAs, he said.

The undergraduate students who rallied behind TAs during the protest demonstrated the united front existing on campus against state budget cuts, Rothberg said.

"TAs and undergrads themselves, they could do something about this. We can stand up for ourselves," he said. "Part of the problem is that the people at the bottom of the pile have to do 90 times the amount of work [as higher ups] to get something done."

The TAs continued to collect hundreds of signatures in three separate petitions directed toward Chancellor Duffey, the University of Massachusetts Board of Regents, and the state legislature, he said, adding that they will be sent this week, he said.

New UMass croquet club 'wicket' fun

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

When you hear of croquet, what do you think of? Oh yes, that fine lawn sport played at picnics, barbecues, and the like. But nay, nay, croquet is indeed quite a serious sport, and our school even has a team.

The University of Massachusetts croquet club was formed over a "social," one of those classic dinner conversations at our distinguished dining commons. After reading a Collegian article on the ground-breaking ceremonies of the Smith College croquet court, freshmen Jonathan Wilker, Willie Delker, Mary Muckenthaler and Michael Beeltje kicked around the idea of forming a team.

"The funny thing was that we wanted to break into croquet, but we didn't know that we could," said Delker.

Wilker's correspondences with Xandra Kayden, vice-president of the American Croquet Association and founder of the New England Collegiate Croquet Association (NECCA), made the possibility of having a croquet team a reality.

After getting RSO status and SATF funding, the team joined NECCA and received a croquet set of mallets,

80 commemorate Holocaust victims

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Forty-three years after it was written, Richard O'Brien read a poem by a Terazin concentration camp prisoner:

"When a new trial comes, everything seems strange to him. / What, on the ground I have to lie? / Black potatoes? No, not I. / I've got a stain that's dirty. / I look at the dirt that's here. / I'm supposed to sleep on it — I'll get all dirty / Here, the sound of shouting, cries / And there are so many flies. / Everyone knows flies carry disease. / Something bit me, wasn't that a bedbug? / Here in Terazin, life is Hell."

O'Brien, provost for the University of Massachusetts, spoke at a ceremony commemorating the victims of the Holocaust. About 80 people attended the service, which was held in the Cape Cod Lounge yesterday and included speeches, songs and poetry by University faculty and students. The event marked the third day of Holocaust Memorial Week.

Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, director of the University Hillel Foundation, spoke and led a mourner's Kaddish (prayer) in observance of Yom Hashoah, the annual commemoration of the Holocaust. Perlmutter said one-third of all Jews were killed during the reign of the Third Reich.

"Hitler destroyed the spiritually strongest Jewish community — the Jewish community of Europe," he said. "Because so many of my people went up in smoke in the ovens of Hitler's crematorium, because they never received a proper burial, I'm here to make a tombstone for them in my heart."

Each speaker lit one of 13 Yartzheit candles, which represented the 13 million people killed by the Nazis. Cindy Spungin, chairperson of the Holocaust Memorial Week Planning Committee, said six million of those victims were Jews. Homosexuals, Blacks, Jehovah's Witnesses, political dissidents, and the mentally and physically disabled represent the other seven million, she said.

In an emotional baritone, Professor Julius Lester sang three prayers in honor of the Holocaust victims. Celeste Krochak, a University undergraduate, read a poem she had written for them.

Perlmutter said the Holocaust paved the way for the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

"Holocaust Memorial Week is a somber warning that the possibility of another Holocaust, a nuclear Holocaust — unimaginable though it may be — must be taken very seriously."

The week's events include the showing of Shoah, a six-part documentary, which will be shown one part each day at 6:30 p.m. in Campus Center, room 903. Today at 7:30 p.m., author Jennifer Justice will describe the experiences of women who survived the Holocaust.

The service was sponsored by Hillel, the Student Government Association, the Chancellor's Office, Central Area Government, the Office of Human Relations, the Special Activities Support Fund, the Institute for Advanced Study in the Humanities, Faculty of Humanities and Fine Arts, the Office of Third World Affairs and the History, German and Anthropology departments.

Christine Robinson, a member of the Office of Third World Affairs, said oppression still exists despite the events that occurred less than fifty years ago.

"Oppression is a barrier [to] love, peace and understanding," she said. "It is a daily routine and we are all survivors of it."

Voting against racism:
Smith responds to racist notes

NORTHAMPTON — Smith College students began voting yesterday on a set of five proposals, initiated in response to racially harassing notes sent to four female Black students last week.

If passed, they would not be ratified, but instead would be used as a recommendation to the college's Committee on Academic Policy, according to Farah Pandith, president of the college's Student Government Association.

With voting scheduled to continue today, the five proposals ask for the immediate expulsion of the notes' writer(s), the creation of a mandatory class dealing with racism, the creation of mandatory racial and cultural awareness workshops, more space in the Mwangi Cultural Center for the campus' minority population, and a response from President Mary Maples Dunn by May 14 informing students of the progress of the criminal investigation.

"If this recommendation passes, it will serve as a unified expression of student support of the needs of the concerned students," said Brooks Campion, SGA vice president. "It will not be binding and it will not be engraved in stone . . . and it is subject to considerable negotiation."

Five racially harassing notes have been passed to students in Chapin House in the past week, the last note being passed over the weekend, E. Shelton Burden, director of Affirmative Action at the college, said Monday.

"Hispanic people sometimes feel that they can't say anything"
Latinos silent victims

By TOM CIAMPI
Collegian Staff

Many University of Massachusetts Latino students victimized by racial discrimination are not always inclined to seek help or speak out, and instead tend to suffer in silence, according to the president of AHORA, a student organization for Caribbean and Latin American students.

> "In reality there are a lot of cases where students have been oppressed and stereotypes have come to life and they haven't said anything."
> —Agnes Quinones

Liza Gallardo, a UMass student who has been AHORA's president for the past year and is a resident of Puerto Rico, said that many native Puerto Ricans come to the United States "when they are 18 to 20 years old" and have never before experienced racial discrimination and have a harder time confronting it than do Puerto Ricans born in the United States.

"Puerto Ricans who were born here have a better idea of what they can do to get help. They have a better idea about what discrimination is because they have lived here a long time," Gallardo said, admitting that before she came to the United States she had "little idea of the racial separation that exists here."

Agnes Quinones, associate director for the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students(CCEBMS), agreed that many Latino students are not coming forward to take a stand against discrimination.

She said while many become vocal against oppression, "In reality there are of a lot of cases where students have been oppressed and stereotypes have come to life and they haven't said anything."

One example of the Latinos' reticence involves a female Puerto Rican student who said in an interview recently she took no action after a professor in a Hotel, Restaurant, and Travel Administration lecture urged students to take Spanish as a foreign language because "you're going to have a lot of minorities working for you."

The student, who asked that neither she nor the professor be identified, said "Hispanic people sometimes feel that they can't say anything, that they should just shut up because that's the way it is."

Quinones,29, who lived in Puerto Rico until she was 20 and now holds a master's degree in organizational development from the University, said that Latin American schools generally teach students not to challenge authority. "You were told to just comply with the system and be quiet in a classroom,' and this cultural socialization carries over to Hispanics in this country.

The vice-president of AHORA, Frances Ramos, said the statement by the HRTA professor was stereotyping Hispanics.

"He's saying that the people who are going to be cooking in the back will be Hispanics, not that there will be a Latino owner or manager."

"It doesn't sound like he said, 'There is a growing community of Latinos here in the [United States], and it's good for you to learn the language so you can learn your coworkers' culture.' "

Ramos said she finds too much emphasis on "getting ahead" in the United States.

"It seems to me to be part of the capitalistic mentality that it helps you earn money if you know two languages. Everyone needs economic stability, but that should not be the central part of your life. There are other cultures, and it is to everyone's benefit to look beyond the [United States] and learn about them."

Quinones said the statement by the professor "is a very clear example of how stereotypes about different groups get to be very sophisticated and subtle. Racism is so ingrained in the fiber of this culture that many of these comments come out just like that."

Gallardo, Quinones, and Ramos agreed that a lot of attention is given to racism directed toward Blacks, and that Blacks utilize various support networks on campus, like the Ombudsman's office and the Legal Services Center because they feel more confident in speaking out against discrimination. But many of the approximately 700 Latinos on campus feel, as Quinones said, "that the issue of racism excludes them — that everything that happens on this campus is a Black and White issue."

She said claims like this should alert professional staff, faculty, the administration, and students that any strategy for improving minority services must "assess and examine the needs of all our students of color."

'Right now there is a lack of numbers in terms of minority faculty and staff, and the ones that are here are overworked and overburdened by the lack of resources to provide adequate programs and services," Quinones said.

Senate to review UVC funding

The Undergraduate Student Senate tonight is scheduled to review a second effort to allot $8,000 to the Union Video Center to fuel its preparation for a student television channel in 1990.

The University of Massachusetts is in the primary stages of a $21 million project to install cable television and a renovated telephone system including call-waiting and a less expensive long distance service, into campus residence halls.

Last week, the senate approved a $5,500 allotment to UVC to assist its preparation for a student channel to be included in the cable system, claiming the center will be unable to secure a channel without updated equipment.

In other business:

- An attempt to create an ad-hoc ethics committee to investigate Student Government Association matters is also scheduled for review, claiming the SGA is "plagued by mal-administration, scandals, and financial improprieties."

The proposal, if approved, will establish the "Right Commission", which will be comprised of the Senate Speaker, the SGA treasurer, four members of the senate and the chairperson of the Government Affairs committee.

Mount Holyoke bans Coke for month

SOUTH HADLEY (AP) — Mount Holyoke College administrators, under pressure from students to boycott Coca-Cola products, announced yesterday a month-long ban of the company's soft drinks from the campus.

In a one-page release that gave no explanation for the move, the college outlined immediate steps it is taking to replace Coke products with beverages from companies with little or no business interest in South Africa.

Students at Mount Holyoke and several other colleges in western Massachusetts have pressed administrators for two months to remove Coca-Cola products because, they claim, the company is reaping profits that benefit racially segregated South Africa.

"I think it's a monumental step. I think it shows some responsibility on the part of the administration in terms of listening to students," said Kushusu Wanzu, a member of the Coke Campaign at the American Friends Service Committee in Atlanta, which organized the campus boycotts.

The action by top school administrators came after two days of demonstrations by some 60 students, who shouted anti-Coke slogans outside the office of President Elizabeth Kennan on Monday and then chased a Coke delivery truck down the street.

Mount Holyoke is one of five area colleges that has been touched by the issue.

Following a March 3 referendum at the South Hadley school, at which more than half of the 1,532 students polled supported a Coke boycott, Amherst College students voted 381 to 304 in their own non-binding referendum to ban Coca-Cola products from campus. Administrators there say they probably will abide by the majority vote.

Smith College students in nearby Northampton and University of Massachusetts students in Amherst say they are trying to organize a similar vote.

Hampshire College in Amherst already has a boycott of Coke products in its dining hall, and Mount Greylock Regional High School in North Adams and a high school in Cambridge have canceled contracts with Coke bottling plants, according to company and boycott officials.

The demonstrations and petition drives were guided by the Quaker group in Atlanta, whose Coke Campaign leader, Tandi Gcabashe, is the daughter of the late black South African Chief Albert Luthuli, a Nobel Prize winner who was assassinated in 1967.

She described Coca-Cola's 1985 disinvestment from South Africa bottling companies from its new plant in Swaziland and Coke is still the most popular drink in the racially segregated country.

"As long as the product syrup is still available, even from Swaziland, that means Coca-Cola is still making business profits from apartheid and apartheid is profiting from Coca-Cola's presence in South Africa," she said.

But a Coca-Cola spokesman in Atlanta called the students misguided and quoted from a letter from South Africa Archbishop and anti-apartheid leader Desmond Tutu that praised the company.

"I am sorry to hear that Coca-Cola is running into some trouble over its alleged dishonesty about the manner of its disinvestment from South Africa and that it is being accused of aiding and abetting the apartheid regime," Tutu said in the April 10 letter, according to Coca-Cola Media Relations Manager Mark Preisinger. "Nothing could be further from the truth."

The letter continued: "You have sought by your manner of disinvesting to empower blacks economically and to help us prepare manpower for the post-apartheid South Africa."

And in an apparent shot at the Coke Campaign organizers in Atlanta, Tutu wrote: "It is easy to sound more radical from the safe and comfortable distance of 10,000 miles than those who bear the brunt of the viciousness of the apartheid machinery close at hand."

Freedom Of The Press

Originally conceived as a leftist political journal,* Massachusetts Free Press *has evolved into a timely news and feature magazine, addressing a legitimate need at the five-colleges

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

In the late summer of 1988, former University Democrats President Michael Greiner was looking for some help. Envisioning the development of a progressive political journal, Greiner was in need of technical advice. Enter Mark Wilkinson. A junior history and French major, Wilkinson had published the Course And Teacher Evaluation Guide (CATE), and was intrigued by the prospect of putting together a news periodical.

Essentially, the Free Press was founded by Michael Greiner," Wilkinson said.

"... he had in mind that he wanted to start a political journal of the left ... and basically he needed someone with some of kind of technical experience putting together a publication."

Wilkinson said Greiner asked him if he was interested in being an editor, and making sure the paper was of high quality.

"I was comfortable with the technical aspect, he (Greiner) thought I could do it ... and it sounded like a good time," Wilkinson said.

The debut issues of the Massachusetts Free Press, as was Greiner's intent, were peppered with leftist political commentary and socially progressive attitudes. In the months since, however, with Wilkinson moving into the top executive position (Publisher), the Free Press has shifted its focus to timely news and lifestyle features, and left all its biases for the editorial page.

"... back then, the Free Press was a political journal, now it's a news magazine," Wilkinson said.

The Free Press comes out about every three weeks, Wilkinson said. Eventually, the goal is to become a weekly magazine, coming out each Thursday, and providing the most in depth listings of weekend events available at any of the five colleges, as well as feature-length news items.

"Ultimately, we'd like to be used as sort of the weekend events guide for students," Wilkinson said. " We already provide an extensive club listing ... and we print weekend highlights of the Five-College Calendar, which most people never get anyway ... as a weekly I think we'll be able to fit into that role fairly well," he said.

"As a news magazine, it won't behoove us so much to report news, as much as it will to run news features and lifestyle pieces," he said.

"We don't have the resources for daily news reporting, nor is that our goal ... obviously, we'd get our asses kicked, that is something the Collegian does extremely well. It has enormous resources, and a huge staff ... and that's the way the Collegian brings people in ... with its good reporting," he said.

Recent Free Press feature stories have provided poignant insights into issues such as the destruction of the world's rainforests, animal research and the nation's space program. Wherever possible, Wilkinson said, the Free Press attempts to feature five college students who in some way are relative to particular national concerns.

"The 'Barren Earth' piece wasn't just a story about the situation with our rainforests, it was a story about a Hampshire College student who got involved," he said.

The Free Press is created entirely on a MacIntosh desk top publishing system. With only two computer terminals, scheduling conflicts arise around deadline time when writers are scrambling to get their stories in, said Jill Stoddard, an English major, and editor-in-chief of the Free Press.

"When stories have to be in on a Thursday, everybody's trying to schedule time on the terminals. A lot of times I end up typing stories in while I'm laying out," Stoddard said.

The crowded Free Press office in the Student Union

The small space allotted to the Free Press upstairs in the Student Union has been restrictive, but next semester, the magazine will have bigger space, when they take over the Alpha Phi Omega office, Stoddard said.

"Right now we have two offices, one at Mount Holyoke, and one at UMass," Wilkinson said. "Hopefully we'll eventually have an office at each of the five colleges, although some of the schools will be tougher to make good ties with than others."

By establishing a bureau at Amherst, Hampshire and Smith Colleges, the staff of the Free Press feels they will better be able to develop pertinent features of interest to students at all the five colleges.

"It's hard for any paper on this campus to get their anchor down. There's so many that come and go ... and this is something that we want to last. It's extremely hard to find committed people ... and that's what we need," Stoddard said.

On March 6, a publication titled The Liberator was distributed throughout the UMass campus and the town of Amherst. The paper made specific references to the conservative UMass newspaper, The Minuteman, and made allegations linking prominent campus conservatives with the Ku Klux Klan and Neo-Nazis. The Free Press funded The Liberator, Wilkinson said, but the staff had no editorial input whatsoever.

"The Liberator was a response to The Minuteman ... precisely. That's never been done before ... nobody's ever countered The Minuteman ... nobody's ever really tried to.

I think the people who wrote it (The Liberator), and this is why we supported them, had some things that be said ... they had some points that they felt were important, and we agreed," Wilkinson said.

"We didn't agree with everything they said ... the Chairman of the Board of Time Inc. doesn't have to agree with everything Time Magazine prints ... they still print it. We didn't agree with all of their methods ... but if we had gone in and re-written their paper, it wouldn't have been their paper, it would have been ours ... and we've already got ours."

The Free Press's news magazine format affords students the luxury of having a well prepared source of in depth features relating to their respective communities. Still quite young, the paper must plant its roots deep before it can be expected to grow.

"We're new, we have to prove ourselves, " Wilkinson said. "People who read our paper know ... time will prove us."

Editor-In-Chief Jill Stoddard is confident in the Free Press staff, its content and its staying power.

"We're going to be around for a long time."

> "We didn't agree with everything they (The Liberator) said ... the Chairman of the Board of Time Inc. doesn't have to agree with everything Time Magazine prints ... they still print it ... if we had re-written their paper, it wouldn't have been theirs, it would have been ours ... we've already got ours."

Fraternity helps out at Amherst youth club

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Correspondent

Each spring Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity brothers bounce basketballs to raise money for the American Heart Association, and now they've adopted another cause that stimulates the heart.

The newest fraternity on campus spent a full day earlier this semester renovating the West Street Club, part of the Amherst Youth Center, according to Peter Eisen, SAM philanthropy chairman. The fraternity also plans to chaperone dances for area youths at the club, he said.

Eisen said the club, which is a place for teens to relax and meet each other, was started two years ago. The club sponsors drop-in hours two nights a week, for which Eisen said fraternity brothers plan to begin training.

SAM's national philanthropy is the AHA, for whom brothers raise money in an event called "Bounce [a basketball] for Beats," he said.

"Sure, it's our national philanthropy, every Sigma Alpha Mu chapter does it, but I thought, 'That's just a one day thing. This way, our guys are active directly in the town of Amherst," Eisen said.

With the assistance of the Amherst Chamber of Commerce, Eisen said the West Street Club was agreed upon unanimously by the chapter as the club that needed repairs and because "some of the kids don't have brothers or sisters; our brothers can be there to hang out with the kids and to be a special friend," Eisen said.

In March, a group of about 20 fraternity members and pledges participated in a major renovations workday, he said. Brothers did painting, plastering, and made electrical repairs.

Fraternity pledges are raising money for the club via a bottle collecting and returning drive, and Eisen said another renovation work day is scheduled for later this semester.

In the future, Eisen predicted SAM would be "interacting with [the kids] on a weekly basis."

"We plan to volunteer for as long as we and they are around," he said. "I want us to totally blend into the whole program."

8 win UMass math competition

Eight University of Massachusetts students were named winners of the 1989 UMass Mathematics Competition, math and statistics professor Henry Jacob announced yesterday.

Sean O'Neill, a sophomore math and statistics major, won first place in the competition, garnering him a NEC computer package, including a color monitor and printer. The value of the prize is about $2,800, Jacob said.

First-year engineering majors Jason Stevens and Ares Chak Yung Ho took second place and split a $1,000 prize from United Technologies, Jacob said.

Victor Ng, a sophomore COINS major, took third place and will receive a $300 prize from the mathematics and statistics department, Jacob said.

Sophomore physics majors Ronald Gordon, Karen McClure and Glenn Fawcett, and sophomore engineering major Peter Lam received honorable mention, Jacob said — each earning a $25 prize, he said.

Question: I've heard that you can put a condom on with your mouth, how do you do it?

Answer: Yes, you can put on a condom with your mouth. For those of you that are wondering why you would want to put a condom on orally, it can make using a condom more fun and less inhibitive, given the fact that it is suggested that you use a condom during oral sex to prevent the spread of sexually transmitted diseases, including AIDS. A quick note before explaining the "how to's." Putting a condom on orally is something that definitely takes practice. It also should be done carefully, making sure that the condom is not damaged in the process (hint: teeth).

In order to put a condom on with your mouth we suggest you use an unlubricated condom. If you don't like the taste of latex you can use flavored condoms or add non-oil based flavorings (be imaginative).

Start by checking the condom package for its "air cushion" in order to make sure the condom has not been damaged or tampered with. Then take the condom out of its package and unroll it about 1/4 inch. Pinch this part between your fingers to remove all air, then twist about 2 to 3 times. Fold the twisted part of the condom over once or twice and place this part in your mouth. Gently hold it with your lips/teeth while placing the condom on your partner's erect penis. Then, using your hands and mouth guide the condom down the shaft of the penis until it is unrolled completely. These directions might not be that clear, but practice may be the only solution.

Question: Why should women use a douche?

Answer: First of all, for those people who may not already know, douching is the process where a woman flushes the vaginal canal with either a mild water solution or a prescribed medicated solution.

However there are some valid reasons why a woman would want to douche. These reasons may include: after menstruation if prescribed by her doctor for a diagnostic infection. If deciding to douche it should only be done with over-the-counter douches, prescribed douches or douches suggested by a clinician. It should also be noted that douching after sex is not a birth control method!

Bathing regularly using a mild soap is usually the best prevention against common vaginal infections.

wickets and balls, which was the first step toward getting into collegiate play. With invitations to two April meets, the team recruited several new members and learned the fundamentals and the rules, according to Wilker.

Croquet is not as simple as one might think, he said. First of all, one does not swing a mallet from the side; rather it is swung from between the legs. And to make things a little more interesting, there are two balls, not just one. One can gain additional strokes through precision and skill, Delker said.

There are two sets of rules to play by: American and British. "The basic rules are the same but the strategies are very different," said Delker. The British emphasizes defense, knocking your opponent's ball away from the wicket, while the American is more high-scoring. A point is scored when a ball goes through a wicket — play lasts for an hour, when the players get their last turns. Both are played on a six-wicket court, which may be either indoor or outdoor.

The team's first meet was April 14 and it was a big one — the American Croquet Collegiate National Championships at the Lenox Croquet Club. The club had a very respectable debut despite winning only one match. The telling statistic: In seven of nine matches, UMass lost by a total of 12 points or wickets.

Wilker, the team's No. 1 singles player, won the school's first match, 8-7, beating his counterpart from Johnson and Wales. It was an unbelievable shot that helped Wilker to victory. "Going for the second wicket, I got a ball through the wicket from 45 feet out," said Wilker. "My mouth just dropped to the ground."

One person who was a tremendous help in the development of the team's skill was Alisa Morris of the Smith College team. "From what others told me, they did really well for their first time out," said Morris. "They managed to hold their own."

With their first-game jitters out of the way, the club sent two doubles teams to the Smith College Annual, which was played by British rules. Again, UMass suffered close, heartbreaking defeats. They were victims of getting beat on last turns, as they lost to Smith 5-2 and Brown 5-4, but the match that hurt the most was the sudden-death overtime loss, 3-2, to Smith's No. 2 team. The two teams continued neck and neck in the extra session for six rounds, but Smith managed to run the first wicket.

This past weekend, the team was invited to its third tournament in as many weeks at the Harvard-Wellesley Annual. Though the team was without the services of its top player, Wilker, both of UMass' doubles teams tied for fourth place.

UMass picked up all four of their wins at the expense of their distinguished hosts. The No. 1 team of Delker and Beth Englander defeated Harvard and Wellesley and the No. 2 team of Geoffrey Zassenhaus and Jennifer Head defeated Wellesley twice. One of their losses was to Brown, who has the nation's second-ranked singles player, Scott Kindall.

Slowly but surely the team is improving with each tourney, team members say. What is even more impressive besides their progress is how they got there. Morris said, "They were basically self-taught and they taught themselves inside. We just helped them out with the finer points of the game and the strategy."

Turner asked Duffey why there were no arrests in last year's week-long occupation of the New Africa House and why the administration negotiated with the demonstrators.

Duffey said the protesters in the New Africa House did not violate the picketing code, and the administration did not meet all the demands posed to it.

"There are places on campus people could occupy, and we'd have no problem leaving them alone," Duffey said.

The manner in which police handled the recent arrests at the University was also a topic of heated discussion.

"The decision to call in the state police was the right decision," but it was unfortunate, Duffey said. "I would like to not have to face this decision again."

Roland Chilton, professor of sociology at UMass, said police use "pain compliance" when people being arrested don't cooperate with police.

"Sometimes police take a small rod, the size of your finger, and place it between two fingers and squeeze until you comply," Chilton said. "I think this is the type of compliance Chancellor Duffey is endorsing."

"I don't endorse the use of pain compliance," Duffey said. "The police are in a tough position."

Protesters said the outcome of the meeting will not lessen the impact of the rally scheduled for 1 p.m. today.

"I think it hurt them a little, more people were informed today about what's going on at the University," Laura Morrisette, a protester said. "More people will probably come listen to Mel King speak and take part in whatever follows."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Lack of sex education leads to desperate decisions

Shelley had an abortion. She was 17, got pregnant accidentally and wondered whether she was ready to raise a child.

"I wasn't sure if I wanted an abortion," she says. "I thought about it a lot, and I still do.

"My mother said it was OK. She said it was a difficult choice to make, but I didn't really have much of a choice, you know. She tries to comfort me. But I still think about whether I did the right thing.

"And I still don't know."

She pauses, drops her head, stares at the ground. Then she looks up at me, as if waiting for a comment, waiting for comfort.

"You probably did the right thing," I say. "I mean, at this age you probably wouldn't be able to raise a kid."

"I think I could," she says, contradicting herself. "Or maybe I could have given it up for adoption. I just don't know if I did the right thing."

I haven't seen Shelley since I had this conversation with her two years ago. A troubled teenager, she had tried to commit suicide at least five times, lived in several foster homes because she couldn't get along with her mother, and spent some time at a state boarding school for "incorrigible" teenagers.

Moving from place to place, she met other teenagers, many of whom as troubled as she, but she didn't really make any friends. She loved some of the teenage boys she had met, but she never really learned to love them.

Pedro Pereira

She got careless. Her ignorance led to making a decision over which she has lost sleep night after night. Many a tear she has shed for making the decision she had a chance to ponder at length only after acting on the decision.

And she'll continue to ponder. And she'll continue to debate with her conscience about which is the "right thing." And each time the debate ends she may come to a different decision. But to no avail.

Most of us know a Shelley. Or at least we have seen one on TV, or read about one in the newspapers.

There's been a lot of talk about Shelley lately. People are saying she murdered a child. But I know Shelley. She's not a murderer.

Sure, she's tried to kill herself, but only out of desperation. And desperation is what led her to abort her fetus. Had she known that ways to prevent pregnancy besides abstinence exist and had she known how to use them, she probably wouldn't have had to make the decision out of desperation.

Had she known.

But she didn't. Because the same people who say Shelley committed murder say we shouldn't teach kids how to use contraception. Learning to use contraceptives will make teenagers promiscuous, they say. And school is certainly no place to teach teenagers about birth control, they say. And that's why sex education in schools is optional. That is, in the schools that have it.

And because sex education is optional, some parents opt to pull their children from sex education classes. But they themselves don't teach their children about birth control.

So children make mistakes. And when the children make the "wrong decision," they're called murderers.

But I know Shelley. She's no murderer.

A grab for more power

On the agenda for tonight's Student Senate meeting, in what may be the first substantive debate of the semester, are two proposed revisions of the Financial Policies Act, otherwise known as Chapter 8 of the Student Government Association bylaws.

Arpad/Moore

Despite important differences, the two documents have drawn little attention from our conscientious and vigilant student senators. The Governmental Affairs Committee voted unanimously last week to approve the version presented by SGA Treasurer Laura Filkins, apparently without having read either proposal.

Although we would not expect many senators to actually read the motions they vote on, we would like to point out several reasons why the Senate should ignore the arbitrary recommendation of its Governmental Affairs Committee and approve the version of Chapter 8 presented by SGA Budgets Chair Karen Talbot.

In 1973, Board of Trustees document No. T73-098 accorded the student government broad discretion in the expenditure of student activity fees. Throughout the 1980's, the university administration has been trying to reverse that action and regain control of those funds. Recently, that struggle has been led by Rene Carew.

Operating within the sphere of the formerly obscure SAO Council, Carew has succeeded in hiring a full-time director for the Union Video Center in direct contradiction to provisions of the Senate Budget Act for fiscal year 1990, at a cost to students of approximately $12,000. She has also sought to add an additional staff position within her own department, and cut one authorized position from the Office of the Third World Affairs, again without the consent of the Senate.

Of six vacancies recently filled within the SAO, none was best reviewed by the Budgets Committee. Carew best expressed her attitude toward the role of the Budget Act when she referred to former Budgets Committee Chair Jessica Mitchell, "Who does that little Barbie Doll think she is?"

The SAO Council in itself is an extraordinary example of administrative overreach. Initially formed to give student government more control over SAO personnel policies, it now serves to give Rene Carew more control over the student government. The Council recently discussed formalizing Carew's role as its co-chair, even though the SAO director is, by the Council's own charter, limited to nonvoting, ex-officio membership.

Rene Carew is certainly not to blame for all the 5 problems confronting student government today. She is at least an improvement over the previous Director, Randy Donant. But given the current personnel trends, recent projections from the Budgets Committee show that by 1993, no money whatsoever will be left in the Student Activities Trust Fund for student activities. The SAO budget is already larger than the total of all funds for Registered Student Organizations and Area Governments put together.

Simply put, Treasurer Filkins' proposed version of Chapter 8 seeks to simplify the budget process by eliminating all language referring to student control over the Student Activities Office. The Budgets Committee version seeks to strengthen student control. Tonight, the Student Senate will have an opportunity to scale back the immediate prospect of a Vichy student government, empowered only to rubber stamp the decisions of the SAO Director and Student Affairs Czar Dennis Madson.

If the SAO Council does not like being subject to the will of the Student Senate, they can individually or collectively take a pill.

Nathan F. Moore is former chair of SGA Budgets Committee and Al Arpad is a UMass student.

You can just buy more fish

When I was a little boy, I loved to stroll through the aisles of the local pet shop. It was an escape for me. I would spend hours upon hours in there, cuddling the kittens, chatting with the birds and annoying the hamsters by doing that which was forbidden — alternately tapping on the glass, blowing on them and squeezing the water bottles so that their furry little bodies got soaking wet. (Oh, and you didn't enjoy bothering the rodents too?

Scott Green

Then of course, there was the fish section. These critters intrigue me the most. They are so intelligent — fish do not get the credit they rightly deserve. They are underrated as animals and as pets. They have, after all, found a way to breathe underwater without having to wear all that gear, such as oxygen tanks and wet suits. We humans have been trying to accomplish this for ages.

Fish are so smart, they have managed to live a work free life of ease and enjoyment. They just kind of hang out in the tank and look cool doing nothing. They have no pressing deadlines to meet, places to be or problems to resolve.

Fish also happen to be pragmatic. They don't build all these elaborate and expensive transportation systems to go from one place to another, but rather simply, wiggle their behinds.

As pets, fish are terrific. They will not give you the problems other pets present. In fact, they won't give you any problems: You don't have to take them out for a walk or to go to the" little fish's room," you don't have to worry about where they are all the time — it is not like they are going to leap out of the fish bowl and hide under the refrigerator or run out the front door every time you open it. And they are a cinch to feed — a few shakes of the flakes, and you are good to go for the next few days. If, by chance, you do forget to feed them, they will eat each other.

Fish will not annoy you like other pets will. They won't jump on you early in the morning and lick your face to wake you up. They won't claw or bite you, unless of course you have pirhana and are foolhardy enough to try to pat them. Fish don't infest your home with fleas or ticks or tear apart your furniture, and you will not find little fish scales on your clothes and in your food.

Fish are not loud pets either. They pretty much keep to themselves. If they do yell or scream, you cannot hear them anyway (though those tiny air bubbles may be an indicator).

Fish are also great listeners. If you need to talk, they are not going anywhere, but if you are busy, fish won't make you feel guilty for neglecting them — they don't care. If you have a bad day and become frustrated or aggressive, you can always come home and create a whirlpool or tidal wave in the tank, and your pets will live through it. If, by chance they die during these natural disasters, you can always run out and buy more fish — cheap.

RA position worthwhile

For those of you who are awaiting RA hiring announcements, I greatly advocate disregarding the discouragement from Jason Kofman ("RA hopefuls should think twice," April 28). Instead, I invite you to jump wholeheartedly into this job. Hopefully, your new, vital enthusiasm will overshadow or even spread to the otherwise disillusioned.

Of course, an RA has extensive duties: s/he is an integral part of a residence hall's functioning. Perhaps this is why, during the hiring processes, that quite a bit of energy is directed toward explaining the varying level of time commitment and inquiring into the potential-employee's capabilities of time management.

Perhaps this is why RA's are provided with special classes which educate them about relevant issues, staff meetings which serve as an opportunity to voice floor-oriented concerns and provide an outlet by spending time with staff members.

And if this isn't enough of a support system, we have a seemingly infinite network of Resident Education programs, counselors and conscientious RD's and ARD's — all of which are constantly at our disposal.

An RA is a campus resource, a guidance person, a mediator, a program/activity organizer, a crisis interventionist, a facilitator of floor community and order. Without us, the residence hall system would not exist.

Obviously our jobs are among the safest from being axed on this campus. Being an RA, even if your floor is not among the best, is a truly gratifying, learning experience which offers personal growth as well as an opportunity to positively interact with, and help, fellow student-residents.

Personally, I qualify the RA position as being one of the best experiences I've had — time consuming and aggravating (periodically) — but always enlightening and rewarding. If you, RA "would-be's," have the belief and confidence in yourself to accept such responsibility, then, YES, please do accept the position offered to you!

Threadgill in the band is worth two in the bush

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Correspondent

Astute readers mkay have noticed that the name Henry Threadgill, has popped up from time to time in this column. Well, now I have an excuse to devote an entire article to him: the release of his excellent new album, Rag, Bush and All on RCA/Novus.

Saxophonist/composer Henry Threadgill has been known as the leader of Air, a trio that played collectively, improvised music combining the the innovations of the 60's "free" period with older styles of Black music. Their best-known album, Air Lore is a collection of Scott Joplin ragtime pieces and Jelly Roll Morton tunes that critic Bob Blumenthal called "unsurpassed as a statement of historical homage from the perspective of the frontiers." Thus Threadgill was one of the first musicians to give the lie to the notion that "free" music is not part of the Black music tradition.

Now that Air has broken up, Threadgill is concentrating on his Sextett (purposely misspelled and actually a septet). Rag, Bush and All is the group's fifth release, although the personnel has changed a bit over the years. He uses the medium-sized lineup in the tradition of Charles Mingus, who had a knack for writing material that balanced stringent arrangements with plenty of room for the group members to express theselves (Mingus in turn was influenced by Duke Ellington in this manner). Another Mingus-like element in Threadgill's music is his reference to styles from throughout the Black music continuum, as the tile of the new album suggests.

Valley Jazz

Threadgill's music is easiest to describe in terms of the ambiguities that make it consistently fascinating. Most importantly, his writing has a classical complexity and harmonic density, but this never gets in the way of the blues feel and swinging rhythms. His group has the ability to move effortlessly between composition and improvisation. Also, he manages to inject a mournful mood into even his most exuberant, up-tempo tunes.

Similarly, the Sextett's instrumentation balances the conventional with the unusual. In addition to alto sax (Threadgill) and trumpet (Ted Daniel), the front line includes cello (Diedre Murray) and bass trombone (Bill Lowe). For me, Murray and Threadgill himself are the standout soloists. The rhythm section includes bassist Fred Hopkins (from Air) and two drummers, Newman Baker and Reggie Nicholoson, who play so sympathetically it's like hearing one drummer with eight limbs. Hopkins' playing is brilliant, acting as a bridge between the foundations of the tunes and the other pllayers' solo excursions.

Threadgill seems to be particularly fond of New Orleans styles. Thus, "Off the Rag" the album's opener, begins as sort of an off-kilter parade march and quickly evolves into a framework for a series of solos. And no Threadgill album is complete without a slow, mournful ballad like this album's "Gift" which features some beautiful ensemble playing.

Unfortunately, there are only four cuts on the album, so the cut-to-cut variety is not as great as on previous albums. Nevertheless, Threadgill is emerging as one of the most important writers in jazz today. His music absorbs the entire Black muisic tradition as well as the individual styles of the band members, yet it all comes out sounding like Henry Threadgill. Rag, Bush and All is yet another great album from this unique musician.

Sand is the man on how not to do the wild thang

What to Substitute for Sex
Barry Sand
Bantam Books

Sex. Americans are doing it less than ever before. People are afraid of disease, apprehensive about performance, or, in today's yuppie world where a meeting for a good screw must be penciled in the appointment book a week in advance, people just don't have the time for it.

Was sex really just a passing fad? Barry Sands, who has written for SCTV and David Letterman, thinks so. He says the Nonsexual Revolution is here and we'll know everything we need to know about it if we just read his book.

Sand lays out everything possible to keep us from engaging in what used to be America's pastime next to baseball. He gives us role models such as Jesus Christ ("Much is known about his Second Coming - nothing is known about his first.") He gives us diversions, substitutes, and turn-offs so that we will never crave sex, and nobody will ever crave sex with us, again.

BOOK REVIEW

Sand has produced a well researched book full of the world's most unromantic places (including the Tupperware Museum in Kissimmee, Florida), and activities to take the place of the time and satisfaction that sex occupied in our lives. For instance, next time you're feeling a bit horny, just call the toll-free Butterball Turkey Hotline. (I'm going to to call the Ho Ho Hotline as soon as I finish writing this.) And what could be more satisfying than writing to Maytag and receiving a free stain removal guide? Certainly not a little (or big) orgasm.

Sure, there are tired jokes and old sexual innuendos in here, but the cooking recipes, (eating is better than sex), and lists of toll-free numbers to call and groups to join, make reading this book almost as good as sex.

Anthrax bringing thrash metal to the masses

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Correspondent

What do you think of when one mentions the word "Anthrax"? Do you think of disease, pestilence, or perhaps dead sheep? Well, if one mentions the word to a metal head, that person will think of something different. Your average Joe metal head will think of the group, a metal quintet from New York known for their thought provoking lyrics and mosh inducing riffs.

Although new to mainstream audiences, Antrax the group, not the disease, is not new to the thrash metal scene. They formed in 1981 and, once they decided to get serious, pestered Johnny Z., founder of Megaforce Records, to listen to their demo and give them a chance. He did just that , and in early 1984 their first LP, Fistful of Metal, was released.

Anthrax has undergone many lineup changes since their birth. It wasn't until late 1984 that their present lineup of Scott Ian and Dan Spitz on guitars, Frank Bello on bass, Charlie Benante on drums, and Joey Belladonna on vocals, was complete. Soon after this, their EP, Armed and Dangerous, was released.

In 1985, they signed on to their present record company, Island Records. Their popularity increased with the release of Spreading the Disease in 1985, and Among the Living in 1987.

But it wasn't until they released the EP I'm the Man in late 1987 that the general public started to stand up and take notice. Their current album, State of Euphoria, is their most successful to date, reaching the top 50 of Billboard's album chart.

The increasing popularity of Anthrax and thrash metal in general is being greeted with mixed reactions from long standing fans. On the one hand, there is a feeling of elation that the general public and the music industry is finally taking the music seriously.

On the other hand, there is a paralyzing fear that the industry will try to commercialize thrash. Before you know it, there will be articulated Anthrax dolls, Anthrax lunch boxes, and Anthrax videos on MTV 50 times a day. This is the most horrific nightmare for a metal head. But as Anthrax drummer, Charlie Benante puts it, "You have to expect that with something that's successful. That's the way it is. People are gonna want to milk it for all it's worth."

If such a tragedy did occur, Benante said, "It would bother me. I wouldn't understand it. But if there was a demand for Anthrax dolls or lunch boxes then we should be taking care of it. Why should we let someone else take credit for something that rightfully belongs to us?"

Anyone familiar with with MTV's Headbanger's Ball knows that, more often than not, thrash videos are basically ignored so that commercial metal videos, which already recieve more airplay than one can stomach, can be given the most attention.

Therefore, it is a shocking, and somewhat frightening, surprise to learn that MTV is sponsering the current Anthrax tour with support groups Helloween and Exodus.

When asked how all of this came about and what the group hopes to accomplish on the tour, Benante responded, "MTV came to us to put a tour together. At first we weren't sure, but then it sounded better and better and we agreed. We are hoping to reach a larger audience, and maybe with MTV we can do that."

There is the possible danger that the old Anthrax fans will feel that the group is selling out because of the MTV deal. But Benante claimed, "If they feel that way then they are not really die hard fans. It doesn't matter who is sponsering the tour. It could be Jovan Musk, but that's no reason not to come and see us."

Perhaps the most exceptional quality about Anthrax is their use of poignant and intelligent lyrics. They have covered topics such as suicide, the plight of the Native Americans, drug abuse, world peace, and fighting to be a person in your own right in a world of conformists.

Charlie Benante feels that the bands New York City background has influenced their songwriting. This is apparent in two songs off of State of Euphoria. One, "Who Cares Wins", which the group has just completed a video for, deals with homelessness. The other, "Schism', deals with racial tensions.

Benante, in describing how Anthrax produces a song, said, "I'll bring an idea and show it. Scott will apply lyrics to it. Frankie and Joey will give it a melody line. Danny will figure out the lead guitar riffs. Then we get together and make some noise."

This noise has certainly paid off for Anthrax. The MTV Headbanger's Ball Tour, which is coming to the Orpheum in Boston on May 4 and the Springfield Civic Center on May 11, has been a great success. Their home video, N.F.V. (Nice F--ing Video), tops the Musicland video sales charts. So perhaps soon when one mentions the word "Anthrax", instead of thinking about questionable military experiments, people will think about the metal thrashing mad group from New York.

Historic will rebuild from ashes

By Richard Sasson

WESTWOOD — Dominic Marinelli of Walpole, president of the 92-year-old Norfolk Golf Club on East Street, vowed yesterday to rebuild the clubhouse that was destroyed in a $100,000, three alarm fire over the weekend.

Marinelli said the golf course will reopen in a couple of days and the clubhouse will be rebuilt.

"It's a disappointment," he said. "The building has been there a lot of years and there's a lot of history to it. But we'll come out of it. The club will survive like it has in the past."

No members were in the club during the fire which started near the club's function room at 3 a.m. yesterday, leaving only the shop and a section of the locker room standing, John J. Sheehy said.

A once in a blue moon chance to catch lone star Nanci

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Staff

Wow! Two great country shows in the space of a matter of months, I'll tell ya, we really are spoiled here in the Happy Valley. First, swingin' Lyle Lovett and now fellow Texan, Nanci Griffith who will be appearing tomorrow night with the full Blue Moon Orchestra at John M. Greene Hall, Smith College, strummin' and singin' her way through some of the most wonderful tunes ever to be committed to vinyl. Believe me, this one is not to be missed.

She looks like she's just graduated from high school, but her wistful, literate tales of life and love were keeping the peace in some of Austin's more disreputable clubs and bars since before most of you was past listening to Fisher Price music.

Although Nanci Griffith has only really come to prominence in the past couple of years at the forefront of the "New Country" movement, a reaction to the LA Rogers/Parton pop/shlock/dreck school of country, she started out as more of a folk singer. Her first album was the part-live There's a Light Beyond These Woods whose title track, a story about a childhood friend, remains one of her most enduringly popular tunes, cropping up again on 1986's Lone Star State of Mind.

Following this came Poet in my Window, which included one of her own personal faves "Working in Corners" and then Once in a Very Blue Moon the title track of which, penned by Pat Alger, was adopted as the theme song for the newly formed Blue Moon Orchestra.

1985's Last of the True Believers yielded such classic moments as "Love at the Five'n'Dime" (with Lyle Lovett on backing vocals), "More than a Whisper", and "The Wing and the Wheel". The aforementioned Lone Star State of Mind was another gem, containing Nanci's now legendary interpretation of Julie Gold's anthemic "From a Distance," and last year she turned in some of her best work to date on Little Love Affairs, with wonderful songs like "So Long Ago", "Anyone can be Somebody's Fool" and "Gulf Coast Highway."

Fresh from the success of the recent live acoustic album One Fair Summer Evening, where you'll find an exquisite cover version of Bill Staines' "Roseville Fair" she is currently touring with the Blue Moon Orchestra whose lineup includes the formidable presence of Philip Donnely on guitar and former Winwood keyboard wizz James Hooker. I last saw Nanci almost a year ago to the day, and she was, quite simply, incredible, interspersing her own material with unusual covers like John Prine's "Speed of the Sound of Loneliness." Prine is an admitted big influence on her own work, and its obvious she shares his gift of the garb.

I could tell you a hell of a lot more about this brilliant Lone Star songstress down to her shoe size, such is the extent of my devotion. Suffice to say that tomorrow night there will be a light in these woods. Go see what makes it shine.

Nanci Griffith

Town may close tiny school for nuclear power plant

MONROE BRIDGE (AP) — Hard times couldn't force this little mountain community of 140 people to give up their nine-pupil school.

But they've had second thoughts since a nearby nuclear power plant offered to lease the building, which houses both the town hall and school, to set up a training center for its workers.

Monroe town residents voted 50-2 at Monday's town meeting to authorize selectmen to begin negotiations with Yankee Atomic, which operates a nuclear power plant in neighboring Rowe. Yankee Atomic would not say how much it was willing to pay for the space.

Any proposed deal would still need the approval of residents at a special town meeting, according to Helen Lacey, who was elected to a school board seat, upsetting a long-time incumbent who had fought fiercely to keep open the school.

"If the people should decide to accept the offer, we would have to close the school, because we wouldn't have a building or any place to hold classes," she said in a telephone interview yesterday.

Voters approved a $76,000 appropriation for the school as part of a $119,950 town budget Monday, but if the town opts for Yankee Atomic's offer, it could tuition out its elementary students to neighboring towns in either northwestern Massachusetts or Vermont, she said. High school students are bused to north Adams.

William McGee, a spokesman for Yankee Atomic, declined to reveal the utility's offer, but said the school building is one of several it is considering to house a simulator to train control room operators. It would continue to provide space for the town offices and library, he said.

"We thought a decision had already been made to close the school," McGee said. "We're not asking them to shut down the school so we can use the building."

Residents have been debating, but deciding to hold onto the little two-teacher elementary school ever since the only industry in town - a mill that made glassine windows for envelopes - closed in 1984. Even before that, it didn't boast either a general store or a church.

Following the shutdown, young families began moving out. The population dropped from 179 to 140 and the school enrollment fell from 19 to 9. The only smaller school in Massachusetts is on Cuttyhunk Island.

Ms. Lacey moved to Monroe Bridge two years ago with her husband, Glen Crane, who works at Yankee Rowe, "because we could buy a house here for about half of what it would cost in more accessible towns." Their oldest son is in third grade and his younger brother is to enter kindergarten in the fall.

Medical waste found on beach

BOSTON (AP) — Authorities said medical waste, including two syringes, washed up on Carson Beach in the city's Dorchester section is the first such sighting this year.

In addition to the syringes, three medicine bottles, six rubber gloves and plastic tubing were among the waste found, but authorities said none of these items showed signs of blood or other infectious material.

"They seemed like old wastes; there were no traces to indicate that they had been dumped there," said Ilyas Bhatti, head of the Metropolitan District Commission, which runs the beach.

"If they washed up from the beach, they could have come from sewer storm drains or from a boat," he said.

MDC workers discovered the waste Monday. Last summer, medical waste washed up on beaches along the Atlantic Shore.

"It does raise some concerns," Bhatti said of Monday's find. "It gives you a warning signal."

Ban on state trooper overtime may hurt highway killings probe

NEW BEDFORD (AP) — The Dukakis administration's call for a halt to overtime pay for state troopers could hinder the investigation of the deaths of nine women, officials said yesterday.

The overtime ban was issued Monday after the House passed a supplemental budget that cut the $2 million needed to underwrite the state police overtime account for the remainder of this year.

That move could hurt the already financially strapped Bristol County probe into the slayings of the women, whose bodies have been found along area highways since July.

Bristol County District Attorney Ronald A. Pina told the Standard-Times of New Bedford that Monday he feared the overtime account for the state police investigators assigned to his office could run out as early as this week, resulting in "a real problem" in the murder investigation.

The overtime ban has not hurt the highway killing probe yet but could cause problems later, Pina's spokesman, James Martin, said Tuesday.

"I have seen no evidence of any slowdown to this point," Martin said. "We're not going to wait until we see what happens today. It has not caused any problems yet. If this situation continues, it may."

The newest financial crunch marks the third time the lack of overtime money threatened the murder investigation since the first of the year, the Standard-Times reported.

State troopers investigating the slayings were ordered in January to stop working overtime after a $170,000 overtime account — and $35,000 from the district attorney's accounts — ran out.

On Jan. 26, Gov. Michael Dukakis pledged additional money that did not come until two months later. At that time, Pina's office had already pumped an additional $50,000 into the state police overtime account to pay wages.

Troopers were paid in March for overtime accrued from Jan. 4 to March 1 with money from the district attorney's operating budget. Troopers had worked 1,773 hours of overtime during that time.

The bulk of the overtime costs was linked to the highway slaying case and other homicides.

Working overtime without compensation is a violation of state and federal law, as well as the state police union contract. However, troopers had assigned to the Bristol County district attorney's office had worked without overtime compensation between January and March on the promise they would be paid later.

The impact of the newest overtime crunch is expected to his state police unites across the state, affecting homicide and drug investigations and drunk driving crackdowns.

TV star complains about $50,000 tax bill

MONTPELIER, Vt. (AP) — Vermont has been courting movie makers to its mountains, but the state's latest move, sending a tax bill to one of the movie stars, could cast a chill on the relationship.

Don Johnson, the star of "Miami Vice," received a bill in February for more than $50,000 from the state Tax Department. The assessment was for the money he earned in 1987 while filming the movie "Sweetheart's Dance" in Hyde Park.

Johnson, who has not paid his tax bill, has told the Tax Department that, "if they are serious about taxing movie people, he would spread the word in Hollywood and there would never be another film made in Vermont," according to a state tax official.

"He was upset because he felt he was being singled out," said Don Lyons, a spokesman for the state film bureau, which promotes Vermont as a location for movies. "He pointed out that if something did occur, he'd be letting people know that they would be taxed if they made films in Vermont."

Johnson's complaints have apparently paid off in the form of a proposed income tax exemption for movie stars and film crew members.

"Governor Kunin actively supports the proposed retroactive exemption for movie companies," Vermont Tax Commissioner Norris Hoyt told the Senate Finance Committee on Monday.

If approved by the committee, the exemption would be made retroactive to Jan. 1, 1986. Thus, anyone having made a film in Vermont after that date — including Johnson — would be relieved of his or her tax burden.

But the exemption does not apply to all. If passed by the Legislature, the tax break would not be extended to Vermonters who appear in films made in their home state.

"This would only exempt any out-of-state residents who are in Vermont for less than 120 days for the purpose of making a motion picture or a television show." Hoyt said during testimony in the Senate Finance Committee.

Hoyt's statement elicited an incredulous question from one member of the committee.

"You mean (Vermonters) who get the small parts — the extras—would have to pay taxes, and the stars wouldn't?" asked Sen. Stephen Reynes, D-Windsor.

"That's what's called the Golden Rule" Hoyt retorted.

Though the Tax Department assessed Johnson's film first, the state could stand to gain about $300,000 in income taxes from his film and four others made in the state during the same year, according to Tax Department estimates.

"But that's in abeyance until we see what the Legislature does with this bill," Hoyt said.

The administration has given support to the tax exemption because it believes the money the motion picture industry brings to the Vermont economy far exceeds that which could be raised through the tax collections from the stars and crews of films made here.

"The administration believes it would be financially advantageous to enact this exemption to continue to encourage the motion picture industry to continue their work in Vermont," Hoyt said. "Plus, the administration sees it as a good public relations point."

In 1987, the year Johnson made his film, four other movies were shot in Vermont, reportedly injecting about $4.7 million into the state's economy.

The states of Colorado and Iowa have similar tax exemptions for movie people.

Those who would benefit the most from the Vermont income tax exemption if it were to pass, would be people who live in states such as Florida where there is no personal income tax. In states where there is a personal income tax, movie people working and paying taxes in Vermont would receive a tax credit.

Gardner testifies he wanted to hurt victims

WARWICK R.I. (AP) - Richard Gardner, who is charged with kidnapping three Rhode Island boys and molesting one, said Tuesday he was sick and wanted his victims to feel the same hurt he did as a child-molestation victim.

On cross-examination, however, prosecutor Jeffrey Pine chipped away at Gardner's insanity defense, suggesting Gardner was not the poor student he claimed and did not suffer the beatings or taunts he claimed were administered by his schoolmates and parents.

Gardner, 22, of Weymouth, Mass., claims he suffered nightmares after an adult leader abused him at a Bristol, N.H., Boy Scout camp when he was 12, and that the nightmares led him to kidnap a Providence boy and to kidnap and molest two Warwick boys, one of whom was snatched at knife-point from his bedroom.

All three boys later were returned, and Gardner was caught July 30 following a police chase after dropping off one of the Warwick youths. He had been free on bail in Massachusetts after pleading guilty to charges he molested a boy there.

Gardner said he was driving aimlessly and fantasizing June 18, 1988, when he spotted Thomas Shearman, 10, of Providence walking home from the grocery and "wanted to physically hurt him... cause pain." He did not explain, although he admitted hitting Shearman in the head as the boy struggled. Gardner said that while they rode around for several hours, he told Shearman "I was sick, and I needed help and I needed (someone) to talk to."

During Gardner's two day of testimony Superior Court Judge John P. Bouncier would not allow him to answer numerous questions about his motives. Bouncier has warned public defender Richard K. Corley that he later may deny the insanity defense.

Gardner also said his fantasies led him to break into Michael Sykes' home July 29 and threaten the 10-year-old with a knife.

He said he took the boy to his car and molested him, but became remorseful after noticing the boy had a physical handicap and returned the youth after about two hours.

Adam Gil, 6, was taken from outside a Warwick library later that day, driven to a Massachusetts park, tied up, molested the next morning and then returned home after they spent the day at the beach and an arcade, Gardner said.

While they were at the park, "I told him that the same sort of thing had happened to me and I was just a sick person who 6 needed help, and I told him I didn't want to do what I did and was very sorry," Gardner said.

Gardner said he telephoned his girlfriend to delay their date, then went with her to a club while Gil was tied up. He returned later with a sleeping bag for the boy.

Gardner has not been charged in Rhode Island with molesting Gil, only with molesting Sykes. Gardner faces a total of 11 counts of kidnap, sexual assault, assault and other charges, several of which carry potential life in prison.

Pine challenged Gardner's story of a tortured childhood, noting that he had downplayed it to a counselor and had failed to tell anyone of his own molestation until his arrest. Pine also noted that while Gardner said he was in special reading classes most of his school years, his records did not reflect that.

The records also showed no discipline problems or decline in grades after Gardner allegedly was molested, Pine said.

Gardner clashed with Pine, said he was forced by his parents to maintain good grades and saw no connection with what had happened at the Boy Scout camp.

"Your defense is that it affected your conduct 10 years later. I'm simply asking you whether it affected your conduct in the seventh grade," Pine said.

Bush nears decision on subsidizing grain sales to Soviets

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush, who has argues for eliminating trade subsidies, neared a major trade and foreign policy decision yesterday on whether to approve US subsidies for the the sale of 3 million tons of grain to the Soviet Union.

Senior Republican leaders of the House and Senate said they strongly urged the president in a White House meeting to move ahead with the subsidies, amid indications Bush would approve at least a partial subsidy plan.

The subsidies have been suspended while the Bush administration reviews both the budget impact of the program and overall US relations with the Soviet Union.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., a staunch supporter of the program, said Bush promised a decision by day's end.

Dole said Bush did not indicate which way he was leaning during a breakfast meeting with GOP leaders. White House aides reported divided views on the subject among Bush advisers.

Speaking with reporters after the meeting, Dole said, "strong pitchers" were made by lawmakers, "the point being, if we're going to trade with Soviet Union, which we are, then we have to be competitive, we have to meet world price."

It would be Bush's first approval of a major agricultural subsidy.

The export enhancement program involves subsidies to US exporters in the form of surplus government-owned commodities. The exporters are able to sell grain to a foreign buyer at a reduced price and then collect government surpluses as 'bonuses' or subsidies to make up the differences.

The Bush administration, following the lead of the Reagan administration, has called for eventual elimination of all export subsidies. But Bush has said he would not 'unilaterally disarm' and call for doing away with such supports for US crops so long as other trading nations subsidize their exports.

The Agriculture Department has promoted the sale, but skepticism has been voiced by the Office of Management and Budget and the National Security Council.

After a sale of subsidized grain to Egypt earlier this year, negotiated by the Reagan administration, Budget Director Richard G. Darman suspended use of the export enhancement program while the review was under way.

Last month, Bush said in a broadcast interview with farm radio stations that his administration intended to use the subsidy program to try to help US farmers gain new markets. "We are rebuilding confidence in America agriculture in terms of reliability in foreign markets and we're going to have to continue to do that."

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, said that he had urged the president to resume the sale of subsidized grain.

The Soviet Union and China have been major buyers under the program, with the Soviets buying more than 4 million tons of US wheat for delivery in 1988-89. In addition, the Soviets have bought about 14.6 million subsidized tons of corn for 1988-89.

According to the Agriculture Department, since the subsidy program began in 1985 it has helped sell more than 81 million tons of grain to all foreign recipients, including about 60 million tons of wheat, plus assorted other products such as frozen poultry, eggs and dairy cattle. In all, the sales are valued at about $8.14 billion, with the subsidies costing more than $2.5 billion.

Gorillas hold on to beat Boston College

Tim Soudan's three goals lead sixth-ranked UMass to an 11-7 win on the road

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

CHESTNUT HILL — This was supposed to be the easiest game on their Eastern schedule.

But the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team turned what most people felt would be a breeze into an adventure before beating Boston College, 11-7, last night at Alumni Stadium.

The Gorillas, 12-1, were forced to make hasty plans yesterday after rain washed out what was supposed to be a home game at friendly Boyden Field. The game was moved to BC's AstroConcrete (at least this stuff is good for one thing) under the lights.

And whether it was the shift in time, the change of venue, bus lag, or whatever, the Gorillas simply didn't play well.

"We should be able to fall out of bed and play better than this," UMass coach Dick Garber said.

In short, it was a lackluster performance against an Eagle squad that isn't even in UMass' neighborhood as far as talent is concerned. And that's a good thing, or the Gorillas may have been staring straight down the barrel at an embarrassing 'L' heading into Saturday's crucial battle royale with second-ranked Syracuse University.

"This team has to realize that it just can't show up and win games 15-2," Garber said. "They also have to realize that after the middle of the season, we are the biggest game on every team's schedule."

The Eagles treated the sixth-ranked Gorillas that way right from the opening faceoff. But after BC's Chris Pascale got the game's first goal after just 48 seconds, UMass rallied to score the next six.

Junior attack Scott Hiller tied things at 3:59 on a two-on-one from Greg Collins and then UMass poured it on with consecutive goals by John Gonzales, Tim Soudan (three goals), Marc Feinberg, and Hiller again to take a seemingly cozy 5-1 lead after one quarter.

And when senior David Avidon scored an easy goal from Jim McAleavey 1:11 into the second it looked as if UMass would coast. But the Gorillas turned sloppy and got out of synch, and the Eagles beat back-up goalie Ted Kellerman three times, the last coming from Bryan Stenberg with two seconds left to cut it to 6-4 at the half.

After that, UMass could never shake the pesky Eagles. Goals by Soudan, McAleavey and freshman Mike Cain helped UMass to a 9-5 lead after three while the teams traded pairs of goals in the final quarter.

"This is just the opposite of how we've played this year. We usually fall behind and then come out on fire at the end," Garber said. "Tonight we came out on fire and then fell apart."

The Gorillas knocked off Boston College 11-7 last night in Chestnut Hill.

Gorilla Grumblings: This is the fourth straight year the two teams have played at BC. In 1987, the 40 days and 40 nights of rain also forced that scheduled UMass home game to the turf of Alumni Stadium . . . here's a look at the UM progress on the all-time scoring ladder before last night's game — McAleavey currently has career totals of 69 assists (10th) and 113 points (15th), and season totals of 64 points (17th) and 40 assists (eighth). Hiller meanwhile, has 97 career goals (tied fifth) and 129 points (13th).

Games rained out

Because of yesterday's rain, several University of Massachusetts sporting events were postponed or cancelled.

The UMass softball team was washed out of a home doubleheader against Vermont, and the baseball team a doubleheader at the University of Maine. The men's tennis match at Central Connecticut was cancelled.

Also, this Saturday's baseball doubleheader against Providence was cancelled by mutual agreement so that the Friars can make up a Big East game.

Inexperience proved fatal for Gazelles

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

There are a multitude of factors that one can take into account when trying to explain why the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team went 2-11 this season.

There were injuries. There was a tough schedule. The weather was lousy. The refs made bad calls on occasion.

But UMass coach Patti Bossio knew the Gazelles were not going to win many games this year and she knew why.

"It was a new team, it was a brand new team," Bossio said.

Before this year, UMass had not seen many of the players that took the field for the Gazelles. Six freshmen won jobs in the starting lineup before the season began, five of them as defenders.

Those freshmen have talent. But the one thing they didn't have is something you can't substitute for, experience on the collegiate level.

Most of UMass' opponents were two to three years older and it showed. As the year wore on, however, the Gazelles learned. Each game and each practice brought a new lesson, a new experience.

With the exception of its first game, a 16-11 win over a weak Hofstra University team, UMass in its first five games was blown out of each contest. The Gazelles fell into an eight-game losing streak.

Losing is something that has not been associated with the women's lacrosse team at UMass. In 13 previous years, the Gazelles did not have a losing season. Never had UMass lost more games than it won. So how were they to cope?

A young defensive corps was part of the reason for UMass' first losing season.

"It injures your pride," Bossio said. "But I was impressed how they took it in and chalked up the learning experience. They never really got down."

Bossio was searching for answers the whole way. The defense was switched from a man-to-man to a zone six games into the season and then back to a man-to-man on occasion.

Sophomore goaltender Liz Keats was bombarded with shots every game. Early in the year it was frustrating but by the end, Keats settled down and ended up with a respectable 10.1 goals against average.

"I think switching to a zone helped them play a man," Bossio said. "In the Brown game they played the zone great because they were so alert and they were so ready. The only time we really got in trouble was transition."

Senior co-captain Lynn Hartman was the lone veteran defender. Keats just transferred here from Keene State because Keene did not have a women's lax team. She has three years of eligibility remaining and Bossio is excited about her.

Keats faced 303 shots this year as compared to the 205 that her opponents faced. Her save percentage though was .564. Her opponents was just a hair better at .566.

So what does that tell you? The defense in front of her must do a better job if the Gazelles are to win a few more games in the future.

It looks like there could be hope though. In the Gazelles' last three games, the Gazelles have limited opponents to less than 10 goals. Two of those teams, Temple and Brown, were the No. 2 and the No. 7 teams in the country at the time.

The young defense is maturing slowly but surely.

"The zone was better for them (the freshmen) because they had one specific thing to do," Bossio said. "They didn't have to chase someone all the time."

The zone ended up benefitting the attack as much as the defense. Without the man-to-man, the offense was not as winded.

But Bossio also decided to change the strategy on the offensive end from a semi-fastbreak to a slowdown offense. The Gazelles only scored in double figures in two games all year and those just happened to be both wins over Hofstra and Rutgers (13-5).

"I had the attack just hold on to the ball because the more we had the ball on attack meant the less time we were down on defense," Bossio said. "We just wanted to keep the score low to stay in the game so we'd have a shot."

Junior Sue Murphy led the Gazelles in scoring for the second year in a row with 27 goals and 18 assists. Senior co-captain Cathy Fuhrman was the leading goal scorer with 35 goals

"Cathy Fuhrman really came into her own this year," Bossio said.

But what about next year. The five freshman that started will only be sophomores next season, which is still relatively young compared to most teams.

"I think we're are a couple of years away," Bossio said of her team being competitive with some of the top teams in the country.

This team got better as the year progressed. Now, they are at least one year closer.

75 take over Grad Center office

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

About 75 people stormed an office complex in the Graduate Research Center yesterday, marking the third occupation in a series of protests calling for a halt to military-funded research at the University of Massachusetts.

As of midnight this morning, there were no arrests.

After a rally on the Student Union steps yesterday afternoon, about 250 people marched to the GRC chanting,"Hey, hey, ho, ho D.O.D. [Department of Defense] has got to go."

The cheering crowd forced aside a small UMass police blockade at the building's back entrance and started toward the second floor offices, one of which houses Samuel Conti, vice chancellor of research and graduate students.

Only 75 people managed to occupy the area because UMass police officially closed the building and blocked access to the offices by chaining hallway doors shut, leaving the remaining demonstrators in the lobby outside.

The protest against military-funded research began more than a year ago when a small group of students decided to investigate the funds UMass receives from the Defense Department for science projects. The group discovered that UMass receives $11.6 million annually in financial support from the department.

Opposition to the funding increased as more people were informed of the group's discovery, sparking last week's occupation of Memorial Hall, in which 61 people were arrested, and the takeover of a Microwave laboratory in Marcus Hall two weeks ago, in which seven people were arrested.

Protesters issued a single demand, calling for administrators to halt all military-funded research on campus. The statement was accompanied by several suggestions for the implementation of the demand including free access to research documents and the formation of a student-faculty committee to discuss alternative sources of funding.

"The demand is more focused than the previous statement," said Jo-Anne Thomas Yanin, dean of students. "It is clear the group has done a lot of homework. The demonstration highlights the issue, but they aren't taking the next step toward discussion."

Students waiting to enter the GRC physical science library voiced some anger to a group of protesters standing outside. The building's occupants repeatedly asked Executive Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson to reopen the center to allow students to enter the library, but officials chose to keep it closed.

The protesters were allowed to use bathroom facilities located outside the office and roam around the north corner of

Students condemn Coke

Speakers urge UMass to follow Amherst, Holyoke colleges

By NATHAN KRYSTALL

A rally to promote a boycott of Coca-Cola at the University of Massachusetts attracted 50 students to the steps of the Student Union Building yesterday.

Organized by the Free Southern Africa Coalition, the rally was part of a drive to have the campus terminate contracts with the Coca-Cola Company because of the corporation's continued involvement in Southern Africa.

For several years there has been growing pressure on US companies to divest from South Africa. In 1986, Coca-Cola sold its South African bottling plants and relocated its syrup processing plants to Swaziland, a country that is economically dependent on South Africa.

Jason Rabinowitz, a student senator who spoke at the rally, said Coke is still the largest selling soft drink in South Africa, providing tens of millions of dollars of tax revenues for the South African government.

"If there is a national movement to boycott Coke as one of the strongest supporters of the South African regime then this university should be involved," Rabinowitz said. "We have been shown up by the other schools who have moved to ban Coca-Cola from their campuses."

Students at Mount Holyoke and Amherst colleges recently passed non-binding referendum votes to have Coca-Cola products removed from their campuses. Of-

Student group pushes for campus Coke ban

If the Free Southern Africa Coalition has its way, the "real thing" might become the scarce thing on campus.

Citing the Coca-Cola company's involvement in Southern Africa, the newly formed group is pressing for a University of Massachusetts boycott of Coca-Cola products.

"We are tentatively pushing for a referendum vote in the fall," said Jeremy Levenson, a co-founder of FreeSAC. "Right now our emphasis is on educating people about what is going on in South Africa."

A referendum would allow students to say whether or not they would support a ban of Coca-Cola products on campus. However, Ashok Ganguli, director of UMass auxiliary services, said new contracts with the company will CATS, the celebrated musical written and directed by composer Andrew Lloyd Webber, is finishing up a 4-day stop today at the University of Massachusetts, in what has been a 2-year tour of the United States.

In between word processing and fielding questions from stage managers and wardrobe, stage manager B.J. Allen found time to talk about what goes into producing a $2 million dollar Broadway musical.

"This is a hard show to do," said Allen. "It's hard to travel all the time."

Allen said the stage managers have an especially difficult job, because they must keep track of all the new people who enter the show.

"For the first year, we had basically the same cast," he said. "The second year, people dropped out and had to be replaced. Now we get about two people every month."

"For each new person, you have to make sure they have a wig and makeup, and they get all their costumes and shoes," he said. "Just to put one person in is a long, drawn-out process. It usually takes three to six weeks."

The 36 cast members, including 11 understudies, are only a small portion of the CATS ensemble, he said. The group also includes 14 orchestra members, 11 stage crew, five wardrobe members, two company managers, three stage managers, five trucks and four buses, for which there are nine drivers, and two concession people.

Senate quiets long enough to laud itself

By PEDRO PEREIRA
Collegian Staff

The traditional shouts and bickering marked last night's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting, but members succeeded in keeping order for about 20 minutes to pat themselves on the back.

Speaker John Dunlap led the senate in honoring the 15 senate members scheduled to graduate this semester. Dunlap read lists of their accomplishments in student government and presented them with certificates.

"It's so quiet in here," said Sen. James Smack, a recipient. "I've never had this much order when I'm speaking, ever."

Those honored included outspoken conservative senators W. Greg Rothman and Brian Darling, and former co-presidents-elect Jason Rabinowitz and Shari Silkoff.

Student Activities Office Director Irene Carew took the podium to congratulate the seniors and to advise the other senators to join senate committees.

Carew's office helps students program entertainment and educational events and helps with student management of the $2.2 million Student Activities Trust Fund. The fund is generated through fees on semester bills.

Senators applauded the recipients, but some booed Rothman, Darling, and their conservative peers Lisa Lupo and Steve Lutz.

"I wouldn't expect anybody to boo anyone," Dunlap said.

Most recipients took their seats upon receiving the certificates but some, including Rothman, spoke.

"The senate's done a lot of stupid things," he said. "It's done a lot of smart things, too." Rothman said he trusts that those in student government believe in what they are doing.

Sen. Todd Lever, another senior, warned his colleagues about student apathy. He urged the senate to mobilize student support for such causes as the fight against state budget cuts, which have caused a hiring freeze and the reduction of classes on campus.

"We don't need hundreds of people at rallies [against cuts]; we need thousands of people at rallies," he said.

The other recipients were Leslie Abbott, Karen Flanagan, Michael Greiner, Stacey Kinnamon, Bob McDevitt, Stacey Meyrowitz, and Jessica Mitchell.

Lever, who chairs the Governmental Affairs Committee, earlier in the meeting noted that the Central Residential Area Government has not yet held an election this semester. The area's constitution states, "In the first week of March, Central Area shall elect three (3) officers to the Central Area Council."

However, Smack, who has served as Central's treasurer, said he believes Central updated its constitution to state that elections must be held in May.

Summer session to offer more gen eds

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

Spring is here, summer is fast approaching, and for most students this means heading home to earn money for next year. But for about 2,500 University of Massachusetts students, summer means classes.

Registration for summer session at UMass began April 18 but sign-up lasts as long as there's enough time left in the course to earn credit, said Kevin Aiken, administrator of the division of continuing education.

Aiken also said the first fee increase in two years will take effect this summer raising the cost of a course from $65 to $70 per credit hour.

The increase is a result of inflation and not the fiscal crisis at the University, he said. Continuing education is self-supported and does not receive any state funding.

"We use the same fees we charge continuing education students in the evening," said Miriam Williford, associate provost for continuing education.

This year's offerings will consist of more general education classes because of the number of students who could not fill their schedules and requirements during the regular semester, she said.

A total of 95 general education section will be offered this summer, she said.

"Frequently, if you're not majoring in the department you can't get a course. So we're offering courses that [students] may not be allowed to take during the year," she said.

Because of the number of students not able to get the classes they needed, Aiken said, he expects enrollment will be up over other summers. But forecasting attendance levels accurately is very difficult, he said.

"I think there is a possibility [of more students] and I say that because of the problem with the courses offered in the spring and the fall. If I expected an increase this summer it wouldn't be from outside it would be an increase in UMass students. But when we increase our fees, enrollment goes down," he said.

Summer session is broken up into two main sections the first of which runs from June 6 to July 14, and the second which begins July 18 and ends August 24.

Board advocates bus stop at UHS

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

A new bus route is necessary for the University of Massachusetts Health Services because students who are sick or injured need an easy access to help, said Charles Walker, co-chair of the Student Health Advisory Board.

"I see a lot of problems with the transportation, which people need. Like the very sick and disabled who have trouble getting [to UHS]," he said.

Walker said the board, which acts as a liaison between students and UHS, is hoping to either get a new bus route and stop at UHS or at least a feeder system where a shuttle van would pick people up at stops and deliver them to UHS.

The board held a petition drive that gathered 600 signatures yesterday in the campus center to show the administration and UMass Transit that students support the idea, he said.

"With enough support I figure it will be done," he said.

The idea is not a new one but for one reason or another service has never been provided and the board is just starting were other people have left off, Walker said.

"I've received a lot of support. Most of the people I talked to [at the table] are like 'that's a really good idea and why hasn't there been one there all along'," Walker said.

Alan Byam, operations manager for UMass Transit, said groups have petitioned in the past for a bus stop, but it would be difficult to install one because of the physcial make-up of the area.

"When we answered their inquiries last year we told them that it was physically impossible to get a bus up there" because of the tight turn in front of the Newman Center, Byam said.

The board has not yet talked officially to anyone at UMass Transit, and an editorial in Tuesday's Collegian was the first they had heard of the idea this semester, he said.

But Byam said UMass Transit is all for the idea and is willing discuss the situation and work out a plan of action.

March tonight to protest rape increases

By SHARON WILKEY
Collegian Staff

Just weeks after the gang rape of a woman in Central Park, students at the University of Massachusetts have planned a march to demonstrate that women should not have to alter their lives in order to be safe.

"Women are tired of being victims, and we don't want to take it anymore," said UMass freshman Ali Woolwich, chairwoman of public relations for the the local chapter of the National Organization for Women.

The "Take Back the Night" march, scheduled to begin at 7 tonight with a rally on the steps of the Student Union Building, was organized by the Amherst NOW as a reaction to an increasing number of rapes being reported at the University, she said.

Deb Levy, the volunteer coordinator of the Counselor/Advocate Program at the Everywoman's Center, said 29 rapes were reported to the EWC from September 1987 to May 1988. From September to March of this year, 26 rapes were reported, she said.

Woolwich said the march was organized to combat fear and empower women.

It is scheduled for evening because, she said, "the minute it becomes dark, that's when we become victims."

Men and women are welcome to the rally preceeding the march, Woolwich said, but only women are invited to participate in the march around campus.

"We want to show that women are strong by themselves," she said, "which is not to say that we are against men."

She said excluding men from the march is a symbolic act designed to give women the control and power they lose when raped or assaulted. Because men are 97 percent of all rapists, she said, the march will allow women to symbolically blame the perpetrators of rape instead of the victims.

Women are encouraged to bring flashlights or candles to the march, to symbolize the actual taking back of the night, she said.

"That's about 80 people who are living, working, and sleeping in hotels together," he said. "On some tours, this creates conflicts. This tour has been unique in that there are not many conflicts. We get along well."

Allen said that in addition to the regular CATS crew, they picked up about 60 local people to help with sets and wardrobe.

In its two-year tour, CATS has made about 150 stops.

"Probably our most favorite is Hawaii," he said. "We were there for two weeks, and we deliberately didn't do rehearsals."

The musical was adopted from T.S Eliot's Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats, a colletion of poems about cats. Through his musical scores, Webber strings the poems together. Allen said that CATS is planning to tour the United States for at least one more year.

of the second floor of the building. Students proceeded to use the office xerox machine, typewriters, coffee machines, donuts, and a facsimile machine. Some protesters leafed through the "Sponsored Handbook," which explains the how the University promotes externally funded activities.

Andy Sirulnik, a UMass protester, used the facsimile machine to send press releases listing their demands to local and national media agencies.

Hilson, Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs, and Provost Richard O'Brien held an emergency meeting in the Whitmore Administration Building to discuss protesters' demands with student leaders and faculty representatives.

After the meeting, Vanin and Harlan Sturm, chairman of the Faculty Senate rules committee, met with the protesters in the research office. Sturm told the demonstrators that research documents would be available in the library for examination.

The research council of the Faculty Senate reviewed the University's policy concerning research funding last week, per order of Chancellor Joseph Duffey. An emergency meeting of the Faculty Senate is scheduled for next Thursday at 3:30 p.m. to report on the research council's findings, according to Sturm.

Sturm also said the possible formation of the commission or an ad-hoc committee of the Faculty Senate will be discussed at Thursday's meeting.

After nearly two hours of deliberation, the protesters refused the offer. Sturm said the administration would meet with the protesters this morning in the Campus Center, if they ended the sit-in. The protesters did not accept and chose to continue the occupation.

Whitmore closed in fear of possible takeover

BY TERENCE EGAN
Collegian Correspondent

Security measures were taken yesterday at the Whitmore Administration Building to insure that demonstrators, who had gathered at the Student Union steps to protest military-funded research on campus, would not occupy the building.

A sign in front of the main entrance to the building read "Building Closed," and access was possible only at a slide loading dock entrance. University employees were admitted, while students were asked what their business in the building was and assigned an escort if they were allowed to enter.

Larry Holmes, associate director of Public Safety, said no problems occured at Whitmore as a result of the protest.

"What we're doing here appears to be working," Holmes said. "It's a precautionary thing because of the protest. We're here in numbers sufficient to provide security."

University spokeswoman Jeanne Hopkins said that security measures were also in effect at Munson Hall, Memorial Hall, and at several of the laboratories associated with military-funded research.

"There was a rumor that they (the protestors) might occupy a building, and Whitmore's usually a target," said Hopkins. "Munson and Memorial Hall have already been targets. That's why the security is there. They don't tell us which buildings they're going to occupy."

Jim Langley, associate vice chancellor for Relations and Development, said yesterday: "there has been no decision made so far" as to whether security measures will be in effect at Whitmore today. Langley said Public Safety will make the decision.

"Business wasn't interrupted," Langley said of yesterday's measures. "But we can't pretend that people weren't inconvenienced."

"I was waiting to go to the coffee shop," said senior education major Laurie Francis. "I didn't get in. There were a lot of students with official looking documents in hand. Most of them got in. People going to the Bursar's office or to Financial Aid got in, but you didn't get in unless you had a damned good reason."

King supports protest of research

The ongoing protest against military-funded research at the University of Massachusetts gained support from a prominent figure in Massachusetts politics at a rally yesterday against the research.

Mel King, former mayoral candidate in Boston and founder of the Rainbow Coalition told a group of about 300 on the Student Union steps, "The true meaning of academic freedom is to be in an academy that uses its work and creativity in pursuit of freedom." "It's not academic freedom when you act out of fear," he said.

King, wearing a rainbow-striped bow tie, told the audience to give themselves a round of applause for continuing the legacy started in the 1950s and 1960s of fighting racism and attempting to focus the country's attention on social issues.

"It's not academic freedom when the only way to pursue the research you want is to take money from the Department of Defense when you well know the research is used to create weapons for the domination and perpertration of fear," King said.

"Our government should be free of coercion and full of compassion, it should push creativity, and not cocaine," King said.

He said ours is a government of chance supported by the lottery, not the political will of the people.

ficials at Holyoke this week bowed to the students' concerns and announced a month-long ban of the soft drinks.

Another speaker, Sekhulumi Ntsoaole, said that apartheid is the "oppressive domination of one race by another" and that "it can never be reformed but must be destroyed."

"Why don't you listen to the South African people's leaders like (Rev. Desmond) Tutu and (Rev. Alan) Boesak? It is a lie that they are against economic sanctions," said Ntsoaole, a South African student.

Ntsoaole compared Coke's relocation to Swaziland to "moving from your bedroom to your lounge."

Michael Thelwell, a professor from the Afro-American studies department, gave a brief history of Coke's involvement in South Africa.

"Divestment has not occurred without pressure from people like you," said Thelwell, addressing the listeners, "and will only occur with more pressure."

John Dunlap, undergraduate student senate speaker, said he would support a ban on Coke and that he doesn't think it would infringe upon the rights of other students.

UMass student Eugene Barros, supports the proposed ban on Coke.

"We're talking about human lives here," said Barros.

be signed this summer.

"I've heard different things on when the contracts are being renewed," said Levenson.

Jason Rabinowitz, a FreeSAC member said, "I want the freedom of this university to decide that we don't want Coke on this campus, democratically by the will of the students."

"We're targeting companies that are strong supporters of South Africa," said Rabinowitz. "When they pull out it will have an effect on other companies there."

Levenson said that the Coke boycott is part of a national movement. Rabinowitz said that there is also a movement to boycott Shell Corporation products.

Sekhulumi Ntsoaole, another FreeSAC member said, "We are strongly asking Coke to express its highest degree of moral judgement and set an example by refusing to mix its products with the blood of South Africans."

Levenson said that a boycott on Coke would not be an encroachment on the rights of students.

"If you want to talk about rights, we don't have a right to support a corporation that provides tens of millions of dollars to the regime in South Africa," said Levenson.

"What kind of individual choice do students have when, at 11 o'clock at night, they have to walk all the way to the S.U.B. to buy a soft drink other than one made by Coke," he said.

Exhibit displays Polish culture

BY BETH O'TOOLE
Collegian Correspondent

Members of a panel Tuesday analyzed the relationship between Polish and Soviet reforms.

In connection with the discussion, which drew an audience of 300 to the Student Union Ballroom, an exhibit titled "Independent Culture in Poland" displayed memorabilia of the Polish underground.

The exhibit, on display Tuesday and yesterday in the SUB, described the story of Solidarity, a trade union and social movement in Poland that was forced underground when Martial Law was enforced in 1981.

As a result of Martial Law, many publications were closed and people were arrested without a trial. On exhibit were periodicals, posters, satirical cartoons, stamps and memorabilia. Last month negotiations were made between Solidarity and the Polish government.

Perestroika is a policy by Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev to restructure or modernize the Soviet Union.

"Serious changes seem to be taking place both in the Soviet Union and in Poland. Gorbachev calls it Petestroika and Polish President Jaruzelski calls it socialist renewal," said professor Stanley Blejwas of Central Connecticut State University, who moderated the panel.

Michael Kaufman former Warsaw correspondent of the New York Times, said he saw Poland during the rise in Solidarity. "It was a time when consciousness was changing radically," he said. "The people who broke communism were precisely those who did this (the material in the exhibit), some of them nameless, and organized a social force, a social movement".

Solidarity member Ewa Kulik said that Polish people organized together nonviolently and broke the communist system. "In Poland there was an organized society and it was putting the pressure on the authorities," she said.

One of Solidarity's enemies, according to Dr. Andrzej Bryk of the Jagiellonian University, is Perestroika. "However paradoxical it may sound I think it is this danger and this particular potential that Solidarity has to be aware of, " he said.

Forensic anthropologist unearthing murder mysteries

NEW BEDFORD (AP) — Doug Ubelaker used to examine skeletons for clues to the way people lived thousands of years ago. Now he's trying to figure out from bodies found along highways how eight women died just months ago.

Using calipers to measure bones and clay to reconstruct faces, the Smithsonian Institution anthropologist brought here by a frustrated prosecutor has helped identify the victims, women between ages 25 and 36 with histories of drug use or prostitution. A ninth body was sent to Ubelaker last week.

His work has not led to the arrest of a suspected serial killer. But he may have cleared an innocent man: sources close to the investigation say his conclusion that two of the women were murdered between mid-summer and late fall led prosecutors to rule out a suspect who had been in jail on other charges.

An expert in the emerging field of forensic anthropology, Ubelaker, 42, is one of about 40 U.S. anthropologists who work regularly with police, applying knowledge of ancient skeletons to the grisly business of solving murders.

"Anthropologists like myself spend their careers looking at the bones of people who lived long ago, trying to figure out what diseases they had, how tall they were, who they were related to, what problems they had, how well they were adapted to their environment," he said. "It turns out, though, that the techniques that we use to study these past populations are the same as those needed to analyze modern remains in criminal cases."

Few anthropologists are willing to make the switch from cold science to cold blood, which takes "tremendous intestinal fortitude" as well as keen observational skills, said Walter H. Birkby, a professor of forensic anthropology at the University of Arizona in Tucson.

Birkby, a pioneer in the field, got hooked when police found a decomposed body and took it to a University of Kansas laboratory in 1962. At first, he was repulsed by the body, which was "so ripe the officers couldn't put it in their car; they wrapped it in a plastic bag and tied it to the bumper."

He and other graduate students boiled the remains to the bone, carefully measured the skeleton, and concluded it was a young woman, who had apparently been murdered. Birkby doesn't remember if the killer was caught; he does recall thinking, "This is real detective work."

In cases in which a body is found mostly intact, police usually call in a forensic pathologist, a physician trained in crime-solving techniques. But if the body has decomposed and little is left but a skeleton, they increasingly turn to someone with a doctorate in physical anthropology.

"Other people may be better with flesh, but when it comes to bones, we're the experts," said Alison Galloway, a forensic anthropologist at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville.

Forensic anthropologists can measure the width of pelvic bones to determine sex, use microscopic pieces of a thigh bone to calculate age, and make a clay model of a face based on the shape of the skull.

Dental records still are one of the surest ways to identify a body, but they often are to available. So Birkby and others developed skull-photo superimposition, in which they project a photograph of a missing person onto a skull to see whether it fits.

A great educational rip-off

The administration has control over the weather. It must be true. There is no other way to explain Tuesday. The day of the teach-out in front of Whitmore was rainy and cold. The ground was muddy and slimy, with puddles roughly as deep as Lake Erie. I pictured my public speaking class huddling outside in the pouring sheet of water. "Maybe," I thought, "Susan [my instructor] changed her mind and held class in Machmer. Or maybe it's inside of Whitmore."

Pamela McCarthy

With that thought, I saw Susan with a flock of the eight a.m. public speaking class (don't ask me how I manage to speak publicly at that hour — I didn't even know I could function publicly at eight a.m.) causally strolling into the building. We sat in Whitmore, in a circle of chairs, with our visual aids we had to bring for the class. I was given a rock. Great. Eight a.m., and I have to somehow think of a speech using a rock as a visual aid. I used the budget cuts as my subject. I can't remember what I said, or how I said it. It was early in the morning, it was rainy, and the blandness of Whitmore was seeping to my brain, which is mush at eight in the morning to begin with. It suddenly struck my instructor how no one gave us any encouragement, the way people would have in the sixties. One of my classmates replied, "Yeah, but this is the eighties. People are apathetic."

I guess they are. When my class was held in front of the cash office, no one took notice. The employees shrugged it off. People walking through the hall didn't even turn their heads. People were holding classes in front of their faces, and they didn't take notice. I was tempted to stop people and check them for a pulse.

Maybe we are numb to the fact that the cuts are severe. Maybe everyone here is numb to protests, rallies, and teach- and/or sit-ins. Maybe it hasn't occurred to us that next semester, we'll be lucky if we get one class. I was alternately depressed and outraged. We wrote letters. We lobbied. We protested. We editorialized. We held rallies. Still, nobody cared.

Franklyn Jenifer is quick to tell us we should earn our education. I've got a hot news flash for you, I did work for my education. I busted my butt in high school. I have a pathetic excuse for a social life so I can get good grades this semester. I work and save money so I can go to school. I have it all over you pampered bureaucrats who make enough money to treat your kids to Harvard.

We've been proving that the school is one of the best. We can't stay that way without some form of funding. Do they actually believe that we can pull supplies out of thin air? Do these people actually think that professors, TA's, faculty, and staff will work for free? They earn their living, like anyone else. Oh, wait, I forgot to mention that I'm supposed to pay more money for less classes, professors, TA's and supplies. I might be strange, but I'm not stupid. I know a rip-off when I see one. I'll be working two jobs this summer to pay for a year-long exchange to Sheffield, England. Don't tell me I didn't earn it, Mr. Jenifer. At least in Sheffield, I'll get my classes. And that is very sad. The Massachusetts system of public education has not earned the money I have been foolishly paying into it. Mr. Jenifer, don't tell us that we are apathetic and lazy. We've done more to stop this than the folks in Beacon Hill or the administration ever dreamed of.

Support for peaceful critics

We faculty in the university support for the demonstrations on campus in protest of military funding of research. We call the students and faculty to educate themselves on the issues, and take part in the debate being generated by these demonstrations. The probable consequences of this research are dangerous and inhumane.

John Brentlinger

The university is caught in the twisted priorities of a society that is ignoring human needs while it is spending billions on useless and harmful weapons. The university should lead the society toward the ideals of peace, justice and human development. It should no sell out. It should not lie and deceive. It should not be complicit in militarism as a solution to world problems.

The People for a Socially Responsible University have made some important demands. The first is for elimination of university research supported by Department of Defense funding. While we support this demand, we believe that furthe??nd a second group with the permanent function to publicize government or corporate funded research on a yearly basis.

We don't consider this an undue infringement of academic freedom, a freedom that has limits that need careful definition. It does not include the right to design weapons without consideration of their uses or misuses. We support the demand for an "economic conversion study" to find non-military forms of support for projects that are peace-loving and ethical.

Another important demand of the demonstrators is for the university to revoke its budget-cut decisions — we shouldn't cut enrollment, raise fees and tuition, or lower the meager levels of financial support that exist for students and teaching assistants. These cuts would most affect low-income and minority students. It is irresponsible and unethical for the university to deprive the most needy of education and resources while the highly paid faculty receive no cuts in salaries. We join the students in calling for a reversal of this disgusting decision. We call for no cuts in student support or in educational services.

The issues of military funding and reduced funds for education are related. In the Reagan-Bush era military funding has consistently increased and funding for human needs, such as student loan programs, has decreased. Taxes on corporations and the rich have been cut, and the people have had to choose between budget deficits and reduced social programs. The situation we are facing at UMass needs to be addressed on all levels of our society and the universities are the places to begin to change these priorities.

In occupying the buildings the demonstrators violated the universities' picketing code. Yet there was no damage to persons or property caused by these non-violent actions. Their purpose was to awaken a community that is lazily accepting disastrous, unjust policies. We commend the students for serious moral commitment. We wish we could say the same about the administration, which tried to block research into military funding (in violation of the spirit of free and democratic university), and acted disrespectfully and violently toward the demonstrators.

We demand all punishments against the demonstrators be revoked, to recognize their seriousness. If punishment is necessary, require them to hold educational discussions with science researchers and interested members of the university community, publishing the results of the discussions. This punishment is worthy of an institution of higher learning, not banning or expelling its critics.

We oppose a university that serves the the dictatorship of money, and uphold the value and the goal of a free, independent university dedicated to the development of all people, to peace, to knowledge and culture, to social progress, to critical inquiry.

John Brentlinger is a professor of philosophy. Seven other faculty members signed this editorial

Inherited culture neglects hunger

I learned something from the International Fair at the Campus Center Auditorium last Saturday. I would like to share it with students on campus.

Besides the food, art, crafts, music, songs and dance displayed in the international (cultural) fair last Saturday, I found a brochure, displayed on the African table, equally interesting. The brochure is titled "In a world of abundance, why hunger?" and is published by the Oxfam America. This brochure taught me something.

I used to consider food, art, crafts, music, songs and dance etc. as culture. I never considered hunger as an aspect of culture. I was schooled to feel proud of my inherited culture. I was never taught to question the consequences of my inherited culture, for example — hunger.

My inherited culture says nothing to me on causes of hunger and how to help the hunger to become independent. This brochure educates me both on causes and how to help.

If the new generation never reviews and refines their inherited culture, hunger will always be around. The new generations are just as primitive as the older generations, at least as dealing with hunger is concerned.

UMass is certainly no Harvard

There is no doubt that everyone is feeling the budget cuts. When people become accustomed to getting all the classes they request and finding themselves in lecture halls with less than 2000 students, they becomes a bit spoiled.

We are New Englanders. Just because we lose a few privileges we shouldn't whine about it like a bunch of Florida senior citizens caught in a snow storm. Sure, things have changed around University Massachusetts, but the ability to cope with change may be the most important lesson we learn from the university. I am not going to cry when I don't graduate on time because there are no classes in my major that I can get into. So what? I'm young.

I'll relate to you here the minor changes as a result of the budget cuts. Budget cuts do not affect everything, they only pick on classes, unimportant stuff. They don't mess with the really neat stuff like cable t.v. and Visitors Centers.

On the South Amherst Bus, I noticed the man sitting next to me who looked a bit lost. I'm a nice guy so I said, "You look a little lost. Can I help you?"

"Well I graduated from here three years ago and I thought I'd be able to locate my old fraternity house. Do you know where BKO is?" he asked.

"They closed it down sir," I replied.

"Wow I heard you guys were having budget cuts but I didn't know that they were that severe!"

As the bus rambled by the campus pond the man next to me pointed to Cutback City. "What are those things?" he asked.

"It's a new housing format the university is working with." "They look like shacks, they're practically scotch taped together," he said in amazement.

"That's okay they're pretty sturdy. Besides the university promises to pipe in cable T.V. next fall."

"Oh, I guess that's O.K. then."

I visited the circulation desk of the Tower Library recently.

Jon Z. Bowser

"Hi," I said in my friendly manner, "maybe you could help me. I'm doing a research paper but I'm a little confused. I can't decide whether to do it on 'Governmental Intervention in Third World Countries' or 'United Nations Assistance Programs for the Development of Post Natural Disaster Nations'. If I just flip through the microfilm I could look at which subject . . ."

"I'm sorry sir, but the university sold all of the microfilm and projectors at the University Auction last weekend. I believe the microfilm and projectors were purchased by Trump Industries for thirty thousand dollars."

One day at the Berkshire Dinning Commons I had a nice chat with a cafeteria worker. "Excuse me, but can I please have seconds, that was the best casserole I've ever had!"

"Sorry Charlie, the university can no longer afford to serve seconds. Says so right here in the Budget Cutback Handbook, 'No seconds, no exceptions'. Order out. Next!"

There was a Monday morning nightmare on my floor. I saw the custodian pushing his cart onto the elevator as if to leave.

"Excuse sir, but when you come back could you . . ."

"Come back? I'm done for today."

"But the stalls are all messy. You didn't even touch them!"

"Listen kid, all I do is fill toilet paper dispensers. That's all the university can afford to pay me to do."

"You only fill toilet paper dispensers?!? That's it?"

"Look kid, what is more important to you having toilet paper or having a clean stall? This isn't Harvard you know!"

Playing the waiting game

Time. What a popular word. Everyone is either looking for some, wanting more of it, or wonder how they spent it all. Not a day goes by when I don't hear complaints about needing more time.

How do most people spend their time? I would think (since we are in college) going to classes and studying takes up a good chunk of it. But according to a recent study, this theory has been proven incorrect.

I decided to conduct an study on myself to try to figure out how I spend my time.

Minu Sebastian

It was Monday morning. I got up and looked out the window. Rain, hail, and sleet on one side of Southwest and sunny and warm on the other. Typical New England weather. I put on my robe and went to the bathroom. I waited 15 minutes for a shower (they were all occupied at the time). After my shower, I got dressed, grabbed my books, and ran out the door. I waited 10 minutes for the elevator. The elevator finally arrived. I looked at my watch, five minutes to get from Southwest to Totman.

I arrived at Totman five minutes late, and had to wait another 10 minutes for my teaching assistant. After one more class, I went into the D.C. to eat lunch. It took me about 20 minutes to finally get what I wanted. First I took a grilled cheese sandwich and asked for some tuna with it. I was told that I couldn't have grilled cheese and tuna at the same time, so I would have to come back. I sat down, took the grilled cheese off of my plate and went back to get some tuna. The whole process was so time consuming.

After lunch, I went back to my dorm. Waited at least 10 minutes for an elevator. About 20 people piled in and we stopped on every floor. Eventually, I got to my room. It suddenly dawned on me that I had a stats exam later in the day. I grabbed my stats book and notebook and rush out the door again. It was at least a 10 minute walk to the library.

Once in the library, I had to make a big decision: What floor should I go on? I got in the elevator. As soon as it started to move, I felt as though I was in a rocket that was being launched. I could feel the food in my stomach come up, so I got off on the nearest floor. I tried to find a seat and all I saw around me were big, yellow stats books. Communal cramming, I love it. I stayed at the library for the afternoon.

Rushed home for dinner, went into the D.C. The line for dinner went all the way out the door. I figured it must be Italian night. I finally got a plate of spaghetti, and then I asked for some sausage, but was informed that the same policies for lunch exist for dinner. Since I have meatballs I cannot get sausage at the same time. The D.C. woman gave me an annoyed look that said "You actually want two selections from the meat group at the same time?!" Sinful, I know.

After dinner, I went to my dorm and waited for an elevator to get to my room I went to my room, grabbed my ID, a number two (as opposed to a number three) pencil, and a calculator and left. Waited again for an elevator to get out of the dorm.

Finally arrived at Mahar to take my exam. I made it just in time, they were passing out exams. I found a seat. I had my test, calculator, and pencil. I was ready. But, there was one problem. The lights were so dim that I couldn't see my paper. They must have been fixing the lights. So, I decided to sit back, relax, and wait until they brightened the lights . . . I'm still waiting.

Professor remembered

I am very disappointed in the university's science department. We have suffered a great loss and no one has recognized it.

To those of you who may not know, Dr. William Rosenau passed away two weeks ago today. He was the head of the Plant and Soil Science Department and the professor of many introductory science classes for both the university and Stockbridge School of Agriculture.

Dr. Rosenau, in my eyes, is and was a legend at this university. I can only speak for myself, but he always made himself available to his students. The first thing you would see when you got to the top of the stairs of French Hall was an open door. This door led to his office where morning chit-chat would be exchanged. Dr. Rosenau would be perched on his stool in the corner drinking his morning coffee and sporting a pair of fashionable suspenders, and he would always call you by your first name.

At the beginning of class, Dr. Rosenau would recognize students who were involved with sports teams and congratulate them on their victories. He really cared about his students. He is one person I will always remember. We miss you Dr. Rosenau . . .

There will be a memorial service held in honor of Dr. Rosenau tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Invest in some UMass life insurance

Dear UMass Administration,

Looking for some new ideas in the realm of money-making? Long-term or short-term plans can be arranged. All you have to do is take out life insurance policies on the students here at UMass. Alumni too, if you really want to carry this venture to its fullest potential. It's all up to you, and of course, them.

Gayle Long

For each life insurance policy of $5,500 the University will collect $350,000 when the individual dies. Not bad, huh? Consider the student death rate per 1,000 students is 1.7 per year, the university will at least get a couple nickels and dimes every year.

Still unsure about the short term benefits of such a plan? However unethical they may seem, here are a few solutions. One solution is to figure out who is in danger of failing out of school. There is sure to be a number of students who are not doing well, and will probably be killed by their parents for not raising their GPA. Look and see who is on overload. Those people are surely going out of their minds trying to get everything done. Contact the professors, and let them know these people need some extra pressure on them. If these students have an accident and fall out of the Tower Library or Lederle Graduate Research Tower, no one would think that you are responsible. Why would you with these people any harm?

Another group of unsuspecting victims are the party people. Convince them, after about eight or nine beers, that the real party is outside the twentieth story balcony of JQA. They will never be able to prove that it was the administrators who gave them the alcohol and the quick trip to the pavement. It could also be a new way to enforce the drinking policy, if there is a sudden rash of alcohol-related jumpings occurring all over campus.

There are others who should have insurance taken out on them. For instance, when the Republicans and Spartacists decide to have wrestling matches in the Campus Center, you might be able to collect for damages. Doctor Thorne and his graduate lab technicians could also bring in money if they all die from some sort of anthrax bacteria. The premium on these people might be higher, but the later reward will profit the University.

Taking out life insurance is just like betting. You are wagering that because of the undue pressures and social adjustments that students undergo while in college, they will not make it. When you are "helping" these students on to their final road trip, it is kind of like point shaving in basketball and football. Face it, the life insurance policy implies that you do not care whether or not the future leaders of America stay alive long enough to be successful. Remember, all you want is the money. Who cares when the students kick the can, or where they kick it? As long as the university has a safe, sure investment.

Who ever said the main reason to have insurance is to protect those you love? The university can consider every one of its students as a member of its family, can't it? After all, everybody loves everybody here on campus, don't they?

So go ahead, what are you waiting for? John Silber at Boston University is doing it. There is a man whose investment ideas are never questioned, never criticized. And he really believes that it is an O.K. thing to do. He wants those on financial aid to remember that aid is not free. They should realize the debt they owe BU, and let them feel they ought to be first on the volunteer list of insured students.

I have a feeling that you too could do a wonderful job in recruiting aid recipients into the insurance program. Remind them that the state has made it possible for them to be so well cared for here at UMass. So what if their names is on an insurance policy? It is not as if their lives depended upon it.

A semester's scrapbook of scribbles

The following is a semester scrapbook of the scribbles in my notebook margins. It serves as a tribute to students who entertain themselves in self-defense against professors who refuse to juggle or tell jokes. The underground doodling movement against lecturing drones will not be silenced.

● Housing Service's latest public relations scheme is the creation of "Theme Communities": formalized cliques in the dorms "which bring residents together around a common interest." Some of the proposed UMass utopias beg to be ridiculed.

Darren Garnick

The Wellness Corridor is an "option designed for students committed to a sober lifestyle." People who don't like beer can live in a atmosphere of "wellness." Conversely, those who choose to use alcohol in a responsible social setting are obviously SICK. How pretentious.

Model citizens may choose to live in the Human Kindness Community next semester. The messianic floor is targeted towards those who seek "to foster a spirit of human kindness and service." Naive idealists.

[bullet] The most likely site for the next Radical Student Union sit-in is the Cape Cod Lounge. The CCL is laden with luxurious sofas, has easy access to a snack bar, and has a piano for protest songs.

● Feminists condemning advertisements for blatant sexual imagery usually focus their rage on the cosmetic and clothing industries. The provocative packaging of stationary supplies remains unnoticed. Recently, I purchased a pen from the prestigious "Sea Island Collection." I caved in to promises on the label. How could I turn down "sensual sun-bathed ink colors?" Women writers may be tempted by its "soft, sensitive rubberized barrels." Last night I tried "Manganese Blue" for the first time. Pure pleasure.

● Wonder what those wacky, zany nuts at Hampshire College are up to? Read their course catalog. Tabloid titles are being used to attract enrollment. Where else can one take a class called "The American Century: What Happened?" or "New Guinea Tapeworms and Jewish Grandmothers: Natural History of Infectious Disease."

● Those who religiously read the personals know that sorority sisters never use periods or question marks when they write. The exclamation point is the only way to end a sentence.

"Greek Week went Excellently! Get psyched for the Awards Banquet!"

"You are awesome, incredible, and just amazing! Your T-shirt and cup sales for Greek Week were unbelievable!"

These are actual entries from the Pan Hellenic Council, the sororities' government. Are there people who really talk like this? How much phony enthusiasm can the female immune system take?

● Speaking of personals, I'm starting to feel sorry for George. Over the past few months, the following ad has run at least a dozen times: "Linguistics, worked Sunday 2/26. Buy you a beer? Call George."

It's May, George. Give it up. She is not going to call. She does not want a beer — even a free one. You deserve better, George. Go out and meet people. People who would have the common decency to answer your note (either way) within 60 days.

● The distinction between social and political activities at UMass is blurred. Events like the "Pro-Choice Dance" and the "Anti-Homophobia Boogie" could spark a trend. How about an Ozone Layer Semi-Formal or a PLO Bake Sale?

Appreciation by those who know best

Last week, 52 protesters were arrested after occupation of Memorial Hall. Before being arrested, the protesters discussed their demands. Occupying a building was the wrong way to gain attention.

I mean, they could have done something really flamboyant, such as wading into the campus pond while holding hands and chanting.

Or, they could have scaled the side of Lederle with pitons and ropes and shouted at the onlookers below. That type of display would have brought media running from such far-away places as Japan and Thailand. That would have gotten their attention, alright.

Lisa Hamelin

One of their demands was outright ridiculous. They wanted to give students binding power over the UMass police. This was a call for anarchy. Sure, let's not have any authority on this campus.

Students can take over buildings, disrupt studies, vandalize properties, and not expect to be arrested.

Porn-reading misogynists could gleefully rape and pillage the village without worrying about police intervention. Students can get stoned in DC, drag-race down Massachusetts Avenue, spray-paint peace signs of Chancellor Duffey's back, do whatever they wish, and not be arrested. This campus would become every extremist's dream and every law-abiding citizen's nightmare.

As for police brutality, what are the police to do when they go to arrest someone and that person resists arrest? The protesters certainly wouldn't move if the police gave gentle little tugs on their shirtsleeves and said "Now, now, you must ccompany me to the squad car. You're under arrest, you've been a bad boy/girl, and you know it." It isn't exactly easy to move a recalcitrant 140 or 150 pound person without using some force. These protesters are fortunate that their confrontation was with the UMass police instead of with the junta in South America or the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia. Otherwise, they would have received far harsher treatment than twisted arms and pinched shoulders.

The police have a tough job as it is. They must frequently deal with far worse types than unruly protesters. They are condemned when they must carry out unpleasant tasks, such as arresting and dragging away protesters or shooting someone in self-defense. Yet, they are rarely praised for the heroic and unselfish deeds they perform, such as saving drowning children or pulling injured people from burning wrecks.

The police are every big as human and subject to mistakes as those in other professions, such as doctors, engineers, plumbers, mechanics, executives, journalists, carpenters, etc. The same police officer who arrests protesters must protect the public from many threats, ranging from drug dealers to rapists. It is not fair to condemn them over one incident. Most cops are fair, honest, and hardworking people who are feared and despised by those who reject authority in all forms, but appreciated by those who know them best.

Tireless Cuban poet lectures tonight at CC

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

For the past couple of days, Cuban poet and essayist Nancy Morejon has been on the University of Massachusetts campus leading workshops and seminars, and lecturing on poetry and the importance of cross-cultural translation.

If you have not yet witnessed the poly-lingual poet, there is still time. This Thursday afternoon, 12:30-2:00, Morejon will be at the sixth floor of Herter Hall for an informal brown bag lunch entitled, "Women's Issues From a CrossCultural Perspective." At 8:00p.m. Thursday night, she will be at room 168C in the Campus Center, where she will lecture on the importance of bilingual language to establish dialogues between people of different cultures. The title of the lecture is "Writing/Reading CrossCulturally." Sponsored in part by the UMass Comparative Literature department, both the lunch and the lecture are open to the public and free of charge.

According to Dr. Irma Allen, assistant dean in the College of Arts and Sciences at UMass, Morejon is "one of the most renowned young poets of Cuba." She has written seven books of poetry, one of which Where the Island Sleeps Like a Wing, has been translated from Spanish into English by Black Scholar Press, and is currently available at Odyssey Bookstore. Her works also include an award winning study of Cuban poet laureate, Nicolas Guillen.

Because the United States has an embargo against Cuba, only cultural workers are granted visas. Dr. Allen explained that it was "very difficult" to get Morejon here, and although she will not talk openly about the politics of Cuba, "she will talk about her work in a political and social context."

Morejon has a very firm belief about the role of an artist. "Literature is a vehicle that permits dialogue with the community," she said.

Morejon has a position of resident fellow at Casa de la America which allows her to perform diplomatic relations through arts. Four years ago, she headed a seminar in Cuba on the status of Blacks, Chinese, Puerto Ricans, Asians, and Carribians in the United States. She has also worked as an editor for the National Union of Writers and Artists of Cuba (UNEAC).

This tireless worker is currently in the process of putting together an anthology of poetry by women of color, including works by Dr. Allen, and translating them into Spanish.

Cats gets puurrrfect score for song and dance

By Michael T. Puopolo, II
Collegian Correspondent

Cats
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
May 2

Simply spectacular! Those two words describe the entire range of performances in Cats. Cats is a song and dance musical based on Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats by T.S. Eliot. The music is provided by one of the musical geniuses of our time, Andrew Lloyd Webber (Phantom of the Opera, Starlight Express, Evita). The loose story is about a group of cats all wishing for nine lives. Before the night is over, and after the cats have had their annual ritual and history, the Jellicle leader will pick "the cat who can now be reborn and come back to a different jellicle life."

This play has something for everyone - music, singing, dancing (ballet, tap, jazz and modern), magic, comedy, drama, audience participation, mystery and thrills. It all comes together wonderfully for three hours of high energy and entertainment.

THEATER

Underneath all the make-up and costumes, there are certain standouts in the cast. Bradford Minkoff as "Rum Tum Tugger" has a great character. Alice Lynn has an incredible soprano that's a pleasure to hear, and Helen Frank also has a great voice. Of course, the song that makes the evening is "Memory." Rosemary Loar does the song justice as "Grizabella." It's a very moving song, and Loar can really belt it out. However, there are certain times when her voice needs to be a bit more passionate and intimate. The entire ensemble is very cohesive and a pleasure to watch. Very rarely does a member of the cast fall behind the others, and in the few instances, it's hardly noticeable.

Sometimes, when there is a touring company, after being on the road for a long time, the energy level of the cast begins to wane. Not this cast though, they maintained a high level of energy throughout the entire production. They are definitely professionals. All the members of the cast definitely act like cats and are amazing in their capacity to sing and dance at the same time. Another strong point is that Cats is a show for people of all ages. Children enjoy the production as much as the elderly.

Outstanding numbers include the "Prologue," "The Rum Tug Tugger," "Mungojerrie and Rumpleteazer," "Memory," "Mr. Mistoffeles" and "The Journey to the Heaviside Layer." "The Jellicle Ball," at the end of Act I, is perhaps the most spectacular dance number I have ever seen.

Unfortunately, tickets for tonight's show, as well as the previous two, were sold out months ago. Cats is a wonderful play and the winner of seven Tony Awards. The set is completely different from the Broadway show, and Gillian Lynne's choreography is altered a bit to work around the new surroundings. There's no kitty litter in this production . . . you might say it's puurr-fect!

WOMEN'S ISSUES

Women's Studies major offers diversity to grads

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Correspondent

The Women's Studies Department at the University of Massachusetts prepares students for a diverse number of career choices, said Arlene Avakian, a professor in the department.

Graduates of the program enter a wide range of fields, from law, teaching and journalism to battered women advocacy, counseling and business, she said.

"Since it's such a new field, things are just starting, so there's a lot of excitement," Avakian said.

She said about 30 percent of the students choose to attend graduate school, and that Women's Studies majors have maintained a 100 percent rate of acceptance to graduate school.

Women's Studies is similar to a liberal arts major in its diversity of opportunity, Avakian said, but their students tend to have more of an interest in social issues. Many graduates go into the human services field, she said.

Jennifer Glover, a senior completing an internship at the Everywoman's Center, said she plans to look for work in social services when she graduates in May.

The Women's Studies major emphasizes critical thinking and a large input from the student, Avakian said, adding that "the students can really take charge of their education."

One alumnus, Martha Kegeles, said that in 1975 she chose the Women's Studies major because "the professors were willing to have us think and create and question the world around us."

Now director of recruitment for the department of Food and Natural Resources, Kegeles said, "Eleven years after graduating, I never go two weeks without thinking about something that I began to think about in those days."

Leah Callahan, a sophomore Women's Studies major and founder of the local chapter of the National Organization for Women, said focusing on the women's perspective has made her a stronger person. "If someone is going to discriminate against me," Callahan said, "I'm going to have a lot to say."

The Women's Studies Department was established in 1974 because of a high demand for the major, according to Avakian, who served on a faculty committee that helped establish the department.

All students in the department are female, said Avakian, adding that she does not foresee this changing in the near future.

She does however, see an increased interest in the women's perspective among younger male faculty just entering the University. And although the department has no male professors, there are a number of men who teach Women's Studies courses, such as Robert Wolf who teaches "Men and Women in Literature."

"I think that in every discipline, Women's Studies has made a significant impact," Avakian said.

Over the past five to eight years, she said, faculty in other departments have shown an increasing interest in listing their courses in the Women's Studies booklet, making them applicable to the major. She said this illustrates that Women's Studies is now known as a rigorous and respected major.

"It's no longer something you can just laugh off," she said.

Sun's effect can be harmful later

By MEREDITH CLELAND
Collegian Correspondent

Yes, it's that time of year again. Spring at University of Massachusetts means time for fun in the sun. But as you're throwing that ultimate disc, shooting hoop, or just lying in the sun, have you thought about what the sun is actually doing to your skin?

According to the Food and Drug Administration, there are more than 400,000 new cases of skin cancer reported every year.

HEALTHWATCH

However, that statistic is often ignored by students at UMass, as it is by most young people.

Dr. Thomas McBride, Director of the Medical Division at University Health Services, said although skin cancer is not prevalent among young people, their behavior now can cause skin cancer later.

"It's those bad weekend burns - short exposures to high intensity sun - that add up to the real thing later," McBride said. "What people don't realize is that it really kills people."

McBride said that in the past, two UMass students died from melanoma, the worst type of skin cancer.

But the amount of sun one can tolerate depends on that person's skin type and how susceptible they are to burning, McBride added.

"There are six types of skin ranging from skin that always burns and never tans [type 1], to skin that never burns and needs little to no protection [type 6]," he said. McBride said that people with skin types 1 and 2 have to be more careful to protect their skin when out in the sun, than do people with skin types 4, 5 or 6.

"It's the blonde-haired, blue-eyed, fair skinned person that should not be in the sun between 11 a.m. and 2:30 p.m. without a sunscreen of at least 15 S.P.F., a hat and glasses," he said.

McBride added that there are many hazards of ultraviolet radiation, not only skin cancer and burns, but also permanent damage to the skin.

"Wrinkling and broken blood vessels later in life are caused by sun exposure now," warned McBride.

There is also evidence that the chance of contracting cataracts is made much worse by sun exposure, he said.

Perfumes, certain types of medicines, and cosmetics like acne cream, can make your skin more sensitive to the burning rays of the sun, McBride said.

Severe skin burns, rashes, and itching can result from these photosensitizers, he said.

McBride urges students to buy sun protection at the pharmacy at University Health Services.

"The pharmacy sells all types of sunscreen, and at a very reasonable price," said McBride. "If you want your skin to look good when you're in your forties and fifties, you have to take care of it now."

Censorship discussed

Activists disagree on pornography's effect

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

This is the second article in a two-part series on pornography.

While anti-pornography activists are concerned about the negative effects of pornography on society, their opponents say that censoring pornography is a violation of the First Amendment.

Yet some organizations claim that neither side addresses the real problem.

Lisa Duggan, a founding member of the Feminist Anti-Censorship Task Force, (FACT), says problems such as sexual violence, child abuse, sexism, and racism, need to be addressed directly.

Legislation against pornography is unfortunately seen as a solution for these problems, she said, adding that the issue is being used to generate public hysteria.

"Legislation and laws against pornography aren't going to solve the problems of violence against women, rape, and sexism in our society," said Barry Lynn, Legislative Counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union in New York City.

Lynn is one of the many anti-censorship activists who have spoken and written against the findings and recommendations of Attorney General Edwin Meese's 1986 Commission on Pornography.

The Commission determined that a cause-and-effect relationship between pornography and violence exists and recommended that high priority be given to prosecuting offenders of obscenity laws and that penalties be more severe.

Lynn said, "I think the only honest thing you can say about the Meese Commission report is that there is a short term effect on some people's attitudes after viewing large amounts of certain kinds of pornography."

Unlike feminist Andrea Dworkin, who says that all forms of pornography degrade women and should be censored, Duggan belongs to a group of feminists who say laws against pornography will not solve the problems that the Meese Commission and others claim are caused by pornography.

"This perspective is quite different from a traditional censorship perspective," says Leanne Katz, Executive Director of the National Coalition Against Censorship.

There are at least four positions on sexually explicit expression, or pornography; the pro-decency position, taken by such groups as the National Coalition Against Pornography, which claims pornography leads to violence; the feminist anti-pornography stance, held by such groups as Women Against Pornography, which focuses on pornography's degradation of women; the classic civil liberties perspective, held by the ACLU, which supports the right to buy and sell sexually explicit material; and finally the feminist anti-censorship position, taken by such groups as FACT.

Katz said anti-censorship feminists are against the censorship of pornography because they feel pornography itself does not harm society, it is only sexually explicit material.

Kate Ellis, a professor of English at Rutgers University and an anti-censorship feminist, agrees with Katz, saying, "It doesn't seem to me that pornography has destroyed societies humanity."

Ellis said, "I just don't think that social change will come about if we begin to take freedoms away from society — in order to rehabilitate humanity, you have to trust society's opinions and give it choices."

Summing up the position held by most of the anti-censorship activists, Katz said, "Any attempt to suppress pornography is itself a violation of our civil rights."

Many studies have evaluated the effects of pornography on individuals and society, and both sides claim that the studies conclude in their favor.

The majority of studies were not researched in a realistic setting, said Lynn. "If you think about it, sitting in a room, being watched by researchers, is not the way most people view pornography," he said.

"I think that pornography is protected by our First Amendment," Lynn said. "It's nothing more than pictures and words about sex, and it has a right to exist, even if it isn't good for society."

Women's Forum

March

A Take Back the Night March sponsored by the Amherst chapter of the National Organization for Women will begin with a 7 p.m. rally tonight on the steps of the Student Union Building.

Women are asked to march with flashlights or candles.

Brown-Bag Lunch

Nancy Morejon, a Cuban poet and essayist, will speak at a brown-bag lunch today on "Women's Issues from a Cross-Cultural Perspective" from 12:30 p.m. to 2 p.m. in the 6th floor lounge of Herter Hall.

Lecture

Morejon will also lecture on "Writing/Reading Cross-Culturally." tonight at 8 p.m. in Campus Center Room 168C.

The program is sponsored jointly by the Department of Comparitive Literature, the Chancellor's Office, the Latin American Certificate Program, and the Women's Studies Department.

Move-A-Thon

Necessities/Necesidades, an organization for women experiencing emotional and/or physical abuse, will hold its 4th annual Move-A-Thon Saturday, May 13 to raise funds and awareness to help maintain the organization's services for battered women and their children.

People of all ages are invited to seek sponsors to support their "moving;" participants may run, walk, bike, wheel, skate, or "creatively locomote."

Sponsor forms are available at the Necessities/Necesidades office, or by calling 586-1125.

Registration will begin at noon at the Unitarian Church in Northampton, and the "moving" will begin at 1 p.m. The route, 5 kilometers, is wheelchair accessible. Child care is available.

Local band flat out guarantees a smile

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

In a time when bands either try to hit you over the head with their political message, or make your ears bleed by cranking their amps up to 11, it's refreshing to see a band that just goes out there to have fun. Flat Stanley is that band.

Getting their name from a children's book about a little kid who gets squashed by a bulletin board, Flat Stanley is comprised of five University of Massachusetts students. Carl Von Cris is lead singer, keyboardist, and flutist. James Eastman also chips in on vocals and plays rhythm guitar. Matt Coffy is the lead rhythm guitarist. Pete Childs, who came up with the band name, plays bass, and Eric Dublin is the drummer.

The band formed in January under the name Greenhouse Effect. They changed their name last month after they decided that their old name sounded too serious and enviromental.

As Flat Stanley, the band has already acquired a large following by playing local parties, where they play anything from blues to rock to funk and reggae.

At a recent party, girls were rushing the stage, much to pleasant surprise of guitarist Matt Coffy. "I was saying to myself, 'This is great, but this only happens to real bands. Why is it hapening to me?'" he said.

Flat Stanley will be playing at the Hatch tonight at 9, (John Bowzer from Strong Waters will make a guest appearance), and they already have gigs booked for Cape Cod and the Channel in Boston this summer.

Coffy started the band after he heard a horrible band at the Hatch. He and Von Cris had been playing on and off for a couple of years and "everybody else just kind of knew everybody else." Pete Childs was picked up after he answered their ad for a bass player.

Coffey credits the bands success to their happy-go-lucky attitude. "We're not out there to be like rock the jungle, or let's be the next Guns 'n' Roses. We're just out there to have fun. We're not worried about making it big time. If it happens, great. But we're just having a good time. People dig us and we have fun."

When you go to see the band, you can expect to hear covers from the likes of Robert Cray, Jethro Tull, the Rolling Stones, and Jimmy Cliff. The band has also begun to pen their own tunes and will be performing two of them, "E Funk," and "Five Years Past the Mark." Both are funky tunes with a reggae feel.

Coffey's hope is that the band will slowly ease out their covers as they write more originals. His guarantee is that if you go see them, you'll leave smiling.

18-year-old argues before state's highest court

BOSTON (AP) — An 18-year-old Harvard freshman serving as his own lawyer argued before the state Supreme Judicial court yesterday in protest of what he believes was a violation of the state's Open Meeting Law.

Josh Gerstein, believed to be the youngest person to argue before the state's highest court, contended the Weston School Committee violated the law when it hired a new superintendent in May 1988.

Gerstein said he spent more than 100 hours preparing for the case. He submitted a 20-page brief. His arguments before five jurists took about five minutes but he said he was "a lot more nervous" than when he argued the case before a lower court last year.

"It's an interesting issue — it's dealing with how much access the public has to government," said Gerstein, who spoke to reporters in the hallway after the hearing, clutching a briefcase.

He said he was forced to skip a class in Russian at Harvard in order to appear before the court.

Gerstein filed his complain in March 1988. He was later in the complaint joined by the Middlesex County District Attorney's office. An attorney from the DA's office also argued on behalf of the complaint yesterday.

Gerstein is now a Harvard freshman majoring in government. He was a senior at Weston High School when he first protested what he saw as insufficient student input in the selection of a new superintendent.

At issue is a section of the Open Meeting Law which has not yet been interpreted by any Massachusetts appeals court.

Weston school officials contend that they were entitled to close three rounds of screening, including interviews, to the public.

Gerstein and the district attorney claim the law only allows the first round of interviews to be closed.

Attorney Mary Marshall, representing the Weston schools, said the school committee was following state guidelines that permit some of the superintendent selection process to be conducted in private.

Gerstein said he has nothing against the superintendent chosen by the school committee, Meredith Jones. But he said he did not know if she is more or less qualified than the other 100 original candidates since he and other students were excluded from the appointment process.

Jones' office said she would not comment and referred all inquiries to Marshall.

The court is expected to issue a decision within four months.

Suffolk County Court officials said there was nothing on record to indicate the age of the youngest person to argue before the state Supreme Court.

Group says waste law not used

BOSTON (AP) — A public interest research group charged the Dukakis administration yesterday with dragging its feet in implementing a 1986 hazardous waste cleanup law overwhelmingly approved by the voters.

The Massachusetts Public Interest Group, which sponsored ballot Question 4 in 1986, said hiring freezes imposed by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis have prevented known hazardous waste sites from being cleaned.

In a "white paper" released yesterday, the group credited the state Department of Environmental Quality Engineering with meeting its mandate to identify some 2,000 hazardous wastes sites.

But two hiring freezes imposed by the governor have held the agencies staff working on the issue to 200 when DEQE has said it needs 460 to do the job, according to MassPIRG.

"The state has a legal and environmental mandate to quickly clean up contaminated sites," said Stephen LeBlanc, MasePIRG's environmental policy analyst.

DEQE Commissioner Daniel Greenbaum blamed the Legislature for failing to back up the 1986 law with adequate funding.

"The reason that DEQE has not been able to meet the mandates is not because of a lack of desire on the part of the agency but because we just have not had the resources to do it," Greenbaum said. "The funding proposal that was in the governor's budget would give us the staff to meet the mandate of Question 4."

The Dukakis administration in its fiscal 1990 budget proposal sought $21.2 million to identify and begin cleaning hazardous waste sites. The House budget passed this spring cut that proposal by $7.2 million.

Question 4 was passed by an overwhelming margin on the November 1986 ballot. The proposal was put to the voters by MassPIRG after the Legislature failed over two years to enact a similar law.

The law required the administration to seek out and identify 2,000 hazardous waste sites in the first three years of the law and 1,000 each year thereafter. The law also required the DEQE to prioritize the sites.

The DEQE has identified 1,061 confirmed hazardous waste sites requiring cleanup and 1,665 suspected sites. The agency estimates there are 25,000 leaking underground storage tanks and 700 solid waste landfills that require state attention.

State proposes boycott of Eastern Airlines

BOSTON (AP) — The Dukakis administration backed legislation yesterday calling on a state government boycott of Eastern Airlines as long as workers remain on strike over the policies of Eastern head Frank Lorenzo.

The legislation, which supporters acknowledged was largely symbolic, would extend to the Legislature and to state contractors restrictions Gov. Michael S. Dukakis has already placed on his subordinates against flying Eastern.

Dukakis Labor Secretary Paul Eustace was joined by legislative sponsors of the bill and about two dozen Eastern pilots, machinists and flight attendants at a news conference in front of the Statehouse.

"This is not likely to break the camel's back," said state Rep. Stanley Rosenberg, D-Amherst, a sponsor of the bill. "But whether it's one ticket or 1,000 tickets, this makes it clear that it's wrong to give that company money."

Rosenberg warned that if Lorenzo is allowed to have his way in the labor dispute, "All that will be left of Eastern will be a skeleton."

Eastern pilot Skip Orr said the legislative proposal is similar to measures enacted in other states across the country.

"The action we took on March 3 was absolutely necessary to save our airline," Orr said. "We're the ones that will rebuild Eastern."

Eustace said he was unsure how much air travel is done by state employees, legislators or contractors. But he said that no one under Dukakis has been traveling on Eastern in the two weeks since the governor issued an executive order covering state employees.

The legislation would extend the restriction to legislators and contractors. It would also cover travel on any of Eastern's sister airlines.

Dukakis has expressed his concern about the strike in letters last month to President Bush, noting that some 1,400 workers in the Boston area are impacted and urging Bush to call for mediation.

BU-Chelsea plan sent to state lawmakers

CHELSEA (AP) — Boston University's controversial plan to take command of Chelsea's dilapidated schools was sent to lawmakers yesterday, with supporters confident the promised renaissance will dispel doubts about putting a public concern in private hands.

"This is the happiest day of my 45 years in Chelsea," said Mayor John Brennan, who forwarded the Massachusetts Legislature a home rule petition which will enable the installation of BU as managers of its school system.

the proposal has the backing of Chelsea Democrat Richard Voke, chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, and is expected to pass.

But other signers were less enthusiastic.

"I can only hope that good comes from it because I have had concerns and I've expressed them," said School Committee Chairwoman Elizabeth McBride, who voted against the proposal citing concerns that BU would cut out parents, teachers and administrators.

Supporters say the plan is Chelsea's last chance to escape the trappings of poverty: shabby buildings, low test scores and a high school dropout of 17 percent that is one of the state's highest.

Opponents, including teachers and Hispanic groups, say the proposal would turn Chelsea into a experimental education laboratory for BU students. They fear the university would skirt open records requirements.

BU President John Silber said he would heed concerns raised.

"We are not going to privatize the schools," Silber said. " we are going to manage the public schools and they are going to remain public."

The contract calls for taking Chelsea from its present state to a "national model of urban education," but Silber didn't cast BU in the role of fairy godmother.

"Boston University does not have a magic want that we can pass over Chelsea and transform the schools overnight. We have to work," he said.

Silber said between $30 million and $40 million would have to be raised over the 10-year period, with abut $4 million needed this year.

Outside, on the steps of City Hall, a small band of opponents said they planned to fight the proposal through the courts and legislature.

"It's not a partnership. It's been superimposed on us," said Juan Vega of Chelsea Commission on Hispanic Affairs.

The Massachusetts Federation of Teachers criticized the signing of the contract before lawmakers act as "indicative of the private and arrogant manner in which the entire process... has been conducted."

Chelsea teachers have filed a lawsuit, charging that ceding authority of the school system to a private university is unconstitutional. School committee members would need a two-thirds vote to overridethe contract.

Hispanics also are opposing the contract, saying university officials have ignored requests for more information about bilingual programs.

Chelsea, a city of about 25,000 with a sizable immigrant population, has seen its tax base shrink and faces cuts of about $2.8 million in next year's school budget due to a statewide budge crunch.

Silber said he would lobby for funds from private donors, the federal government and the state, advertising the reforms of Chelsea as a possible road to reviving the area a few miles from Boston.

"Chelsea is a city waiting for a renaissance to happen," Silber said. "If we can improve those schools, people will move back into Chelsea."

Vote inches Seabrook closer to low-power license

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Nuclear Regulatory Commission, in a vote that places the Seabrook, N.H., plant a step closer to a low-power license, ruled yesterday that low-power tests could take place even though plant officials don't have a place to dump low-level radioactive waste.

In a 5-0 ruling, the commission dismissed a request by Massachusetts officials to hod Atomic Safety and Licensing Board hearings on the waste issue.

The ruling removes the latest in along sries of regulatory and legal obstacles that for more than two years has stood in the way of a low-power testing permit for the $6 billion plant.

Commission officials say the next step will be whether the NRC staff is satisfied that the plant's owners have properly guaranteed that they could raise $72.1 million to cover added dismantling costs in case the reactor is tested with radioactive fuel but never operates commercially.

If the staff approves the decommissioning plan, the NRC would then consider petitions by Seabrook opponents to impose a stay on the low-power license.

The license would be granted immediately if the NRC votes against a stay. That could come as early as 10 days after the staff's certification, which could be announced at any time, according to company and commission officials.

Opponents likely would challenge the license in court, but their time would be limited. Seabrook spokesman Ronald A. Shur has said plant operators are ready to begin a 10-day "warm-up" period, a precursor to low-power testing, within 24 hours of receiving the license. Ten days of testing would start immediately after the warm-up, he said.

A low-power license is critical for bothe sidesw in the war over the Seabrook plant.

Plant owners need the low-power permit before receiving a commercial operating license. Seabrook opponents, meanwhile, say a possible conversion of the plant into other energy uses could be lost if the plant is contaminated by low-power testing.

The request for hearings on the low-level waste issue was filed in March by Massachusetts Attorney General James Shannon on behalf of the state, the Seacoast Anti-Pollution League and the New England Coalition on Nuclear Pollution.

The opponents argued that the lack of an agreement by New Hampshire to haul its low-level waste to a dump site could increase the project's cost.

New Hampshire had been denied access to low-level dumps in South Carolina and Washington state and has yet to reach an agreement with a Nevada facility.

In a five-page order, the commission said the opponents failed to demonstrate how the $72.1 million guarantee would be inadequate to cover "the limited additional potential costs of continued onsite storage" until New Hampshire becomes responsible for the waste in 1996 in accordance with federal law.

"This shows how the NRC refuses to acknowledge the consequences of even low-power testing at Seabrook and is willing to stick the people of this region with a needless cost of radiation," she said.

Seabrook officials estimate that the plant would generate about 36,000 cubic feet of low-level waste if the plant runs at low-power then has to be decommissioned.

"HOW I MADE $18,000 FOR COLLEGE BY WORKING WEEKENDS."

As soon as I finished Advanced Training, the Guard gave me a cash bonus of $2,000. I'm also getting another $5,000 for tuition and books, thanks to the New GI Bill.

Not to mention my monthly Army Guard paychecks. They'll add up to more than $11,000 over the six years I'm in the Guard.

And if I take out a college loan, the Guard will help me pay it back—up to $1,500 a year, plus interest.

It all adds up to $18,000—or more—for college for just a little of my time. And that's a heck of a better deal than any car wash will give you.

THE GUARD CAN HELP PUT YOU THROUGH COLLEGE, TOO. SEE YOUR LOCAL RECRUITER FOR DETAILS, CALL TOLL-FREE 800-638-7600,* OR MAIL THIS COUPON.

When my friends and I graduated from high school, we all took part-time jobs to pay for college.

They ended up in car washes and hamburger joints, putting in long hours for little pay.

Not me. My job takes just one weekend a month and two weeks a year. Yet, I'm earning $18,000 for college.

Because I joined my local Army National Guard.

They're the people who help our state during emergencies like hurricanes and floods. They're also an important part of our country's military defense.

So, since I'm helping them do such an important job, they're helping me make it through school.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You are more beguiling and magnetic than ever now. Better concentrate on getting your priorities in order or you could miss out on some wonderful opportunities. Put work ahead of fun.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Today's events will help turn negative factors into positive ones. Not a good time for taking risks with your finances or relationships. Stick to the tried-and-true. A conventional approach works best.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Pay bills on time to protect your credit rating. Fortunate financial developments mean that you will have funds for tuition, home repairs. Avoid scattering your energies; tackle one project at a time.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Courage will help you overcome a barrier today. Look carefully and you will find hidden benefits in a project that goes sour. Something you thought lost forever is found. Count your blessings!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Spruce up your wardrobe if job-hunting or pursuit of a member of the opposite sex. You want to please everyone but should realize that is impossible. Be true to your high principles.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): It is OK to indulge some of your whims now. Your partner or children will enjoy your new hobby. There are no shortcuts when it comes to paying bills. Review your accounts.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You tend to fret whenever loved one shows signs of discontent. Maintain a positive attitude and everything will eventually slip into place. Others look to you for reassurance.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You are now able to penetrate the unlighted areas of your life. Your quick mind comes up with alternative solutions to a variety of problems. Share your hopes with those closest to your heart.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A commitment you made some time ago could turn your life topsy turvy now. Do not fret. It could also lead you into a delicious new relationship. Know your own heart.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You have a mandate to accomplish something important. Stop waiting for others to move up their minds; if necessary, move forward on your own. Your high ideals are source of inspiration.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Be patient in building a significant relationship and you will eventually get what you have been looking for. Do not be so secretive about your plans. Friends and family members want to help.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Family tensions will mount until you admit a problem and start to deal with it openly. You gain an important ally at work. Cherish a new partnership. Teamwork produces higher profits.

I was appalled at how much disregard the Gorilla-maniacs had for their own team. Oranges flew every time there was a goal, a bad call or a drop in the temperature.

Sparing you any more details, the Gorillas were put on the man-down for several minutes, which is like a millenium in lacrosse. Syracuse scored several consecutive goals, took command and won the game.

To make matters worse, a former Collegian sports editor had written a quasi-humorous column about the orange-throwing ways of Syracuse opponents before the game. In it, a Syracuse assistant talked of how it was difficult having a fruit as a mascot.

From there it went on, saying that the fans were planning to throw oranges, and the coach finished by saying "we're used to it . . . the way we're going to play will be incentive for fans to get involved."

The writer later denied that the column had an effect. But while it didn't directly tell people to bring oranges, it didn't make any attempt to deter a potentially dangerous problem.

And now, that's where I come in.

People haven't forgotten that incident. I'm constantly asked about it. Letters have been written to me. The subject even popped up in one of my classes the other day.

Well, it's been two years and some things have changed. The alcohol policy has dampened some of the chaos that used to accompany UMass lacrosse.

But then again, there hasn't been a game like that on this campus since. But the waiting is over. Syracuse and UMass meet again Saturday at 1 p.m. at the Stadium.

By now, you should get the gist of my message. There aren't going to be many people this Saturday who are going to take too kindly to drunken fans with a fruit fetish.

Plain and simple — don't throw oranges. Or orange juice, orange life preservers, or orange plastic street hockey pucks. Don't eat orange M & M's, suck orange lollipops, or wear orange underwear. Don't paint your hair orange. Don't even drive to the game in an orange car.

For that matter, don't throw bananas. Or watermelons, artichokes, mangos, kiwi or any type of tropical fruit. Don't throw rocks, bricks, hamburgers, cups, frisbees, etc. Just don't.

For the safety and the happiness or everyone concerned, be on your best behavior tomorrow. I'm certainly not trying to spoil anyone's fun, don't get me wrong. But there's a fine line between being downright supportive fans and being obnoxious, drunken jerks. Even throw selfish in while we're at it.

There are 40 players and three coaches who would probably get a lifetime's worth of thrills out of beating Syracuse. Yes, it's that big of a game. And believe me, I wouldn't want 40 some-odd angry stick-wielding lax players banging down my door Saturday night if the fans cost them the game again.

But don't let this crusade scare you off. If anything, this should also be an open plea to attract people to what may be the biggest game on this campus in a while.

UMass, on a large scale is full of people who don't give a damn about what happens Saturday. But fortunately there are those who can put off campus politics, protests and writing term papers to get themselves engrossed in the drama of an athletic contest. This part of the sermon isn't directed at them.

Maybe you've never seen a lacrosse game, and chances are fair you wouldn't understand it if you did. That doesn't matter. You might just yell when we score, or boo when Syracuse scores, and jeer the refs when they make a bad call.

■ softball sweeps

ing with a pop up. On the play the UMass second baseman, Miller, and right fielder Schilling failed to communicate and the ball fell in for a error. Fritz would later score on a fielder's choice.

"They should not have had that run across," said Sortino. "We have been waiting for that play to happen. I am just glad it happened here where it did Christine Wanner pitched well and not hurt us. We ironed it out." improved her mark to 8-7.

Today the UMass softball team will travel to Providence to take on the Friars. "We always have a tough time against them."

said Sortino. "Their scrappy and up for us."

Dartmouth rebounded in the bottom of the fifth, as Mahoney reached on an infield single, stole second and came around on a blooper to left by Rich Mazzola.

In the sixth, Drew Comeau collected his sixth home run of the season, driving a change-up through the pine trees directly beyond the foul pole in left.

Extra Bases: Ciaglo dropped to 5-3, his second straight loss. UMass, meanwhile, has now dropped seven straight contests . . . Saturday's scheduled doubleheader against Providence College at Lorden Field has been cancelled. According to a mutual agreement between the teams, the games would be cancelled if either team needed a day to make up league games. The Friars have to make up a crucial Big East twinbill.

Grounded Bird spelled early exit from playoffs for C's

By HOWARD ULMAN
AP Sports Writer

BOSTON — The hallowed hall, filled so often with sounds of celebration, was silent and almost empty. From the balcony's shadows, one lingering fan's pained plea echoed mournfully through the gloom.

"La-reeeee, La-reeeee, La-reeeee."

Where were you, Larry Bird, in our time of need?

The wail bounced off Boston Garden rafters still

Larry Bird watched in street clothes as the Celtics were eliminated from the NBA playoffs by Detroit this week.

decorated — like Christmas lights left up after the holiday has passed — with 16 championship banners, reminders of happier times.

Boston's worst season in a decade had just ended. Bird spent the final game — a 100-85 loss to Detroit Tuesday night — in a sweater at the end of the bench instead of in a Celtics' jersey in the middle of the action.

Forget about the Celtics' other injuries and inexperience. Forget about the improvement of NBA rivals. The fan's cry cut right to the heart of the proud franchise's problems.

Without Bird, the Celtics are ordinary. With him, they're outstanding.

Wait 'til next year.

"You take Michael Jordan away from the Bulls, you take Magic Johnson away from the Lakers, you see where they are," Boston center Joe Kleine said.

When Bird is healthy and in playing condition again, "I would think that he will be what he's always been," Coach Jimmy Rodgers said, "A great player."

Until Bird goes through training camp without a recurrence of physical problems and shows his skills didn't wither during his lost season, there will be doubts that he can be the dominant player he once was.

He had surgery to remove bone spurs from both heels Nov. 19 and didn't play again. In a sport that requires so much running, jumping and changing direction, there is no guarantee that his repaired feet will carry him to his previous heights.

Bird played in only six games this season. He missed the next 79, including all three in the playoffs.

Boston was 42-40 during the regular season, its worst record since 1978-79, the last time it missed the playoffs. It lost the opening series to the Pistons, 3-0, marking only the fourth time it had been swept in the 82 playoff series in franchise history.

But Bird's absence wasn't all bad. It accelerated Boston's already planned transition from an aging squad with a halfcourt offense to a younger team that could run and leap.

Had Bird been healthy all season, the Celtics might have an entirely different look.

Reggie Lewis, who took his starting spot, wouldn't have had as much opportunity to emerge as an offensive force in his second NBA season.

Kleine and Ed Pinckney, who both filled Boston's need for frontcourt depth, might not have been obtained from Sacramento for Brad Lohaus and Danny Ainge.

Kevin Gamble, a rookie guard who averaged 22.8 points in the last six regular-season games and showed he could consistently hit outside shots and drive aggressively to the basket, might not be on the team. He was in the Continental Basketball Association when Boston signed him on Dec. 15 to take Bird's roster spot.

Another injury knocked veteran guard Jim Paxson out for the season following wrist surgery. On March 28, another CBA refugee, guard Kelvin Upshaw, replaced him. Upshaw showed skills at filling in for starter Brian Shaw as the point man for Boston's uptempo offense, although he tailed off at the end of the season.

In the playoffs, two veteran starters were hobbled — center Robert Parish by knee and elbow tendinitis and guard Dennis Johnson by a sprained ankle — and Gamble missed the last two games with a groin injury.

"We had a lot of physical problems this year," said Rodgers, who constantly had to make adjustments with so many players joining the team in midseason. "There was a lot of adversity.

"I couldn't be prouder of this team in terms of hanging together through all that's happened this season. They worked hard, they scrapped. We have something to build on and look forward to next season."

Upshaw and Gamble must prove they can produce over the long haul and Johnson, who will be entering his final pro season, has slowed down defensively and still can't hit shots consistently. But Shaw, a poised rookie, looms as the man to orchestrate Boston's offense in the '90s.

Once Bird reclaims his starting spot, the Celtics could use Lewis as a sixth man who could provide much needed outside shooting. Kleine and Pinckney are talented backups who can give Parish and Kevin McHale needed rest in the twilight of their careers.

Bird's absence "gave some younger guys time to play and show what they could do," Shaw said. "Everything happens for a reason. Who knows what would have happened if all those guys were healthy for the entire season.

"The younger guys have some experience . . . so it's only going to get better from here on out."

"It was a rebuilding year for us," Lewis said. "Everything that could go wrong did go wrong."

The Celtics lost the decisive game to Detroit on their homecourt, where they had won 15 of their previous 16 games.

They scored only 30 points in the final half of their season.

They were knocked out in the first round for the first time in 33 years.

The same problems that plagued them throughout their season were there at the end — an inability to sustain their offense or make big shots with the game on the line.

"La-reeeee, La-reeeee, La-reeeee."

Minutewomen sweep Catamounts

UMass remains undefeated, 14-0, at Totman Field

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Correspondent

As it was for Dorothy in the Emerald City, It is also for the University of Massachusetts softball team. There is no place like home.

The Minutewomen swept the University of Vermont in a doubleheader yesterday, 1-0 and 4-1. In doing so they improved their record to 25-15 and also won their 14th home game without a loss.

In the first game the story was once again the pitching of freshman Holly Aprile. Aprile stifled the Vermont batters, allowing just five hits while striking out seven. In doing so she improved her personal record to 16-8.

Aprile had found herself in a minor jam in the top of the second. Kristen Shaeffer led of Vermont's half of the inning with a bloop single that dropped in front of Bonnie Schilling. Aprile then made a nice play on a sacrifice bunt attempt by Joey Fritz. Aprile came in on the bunt, grabbed it, spun around and fired to second to cut down the lead runner. She then struck out the next two batters to retire the side.

There would be a scare of a different kind in the top of the fourth. With a runner on first the Vermont batter drilled a line drive that caught Aprile on the pitching hand. The ball bounced to catcher Cherie DellAnno who gunned the runner out at first. Aprile was in pain but was able to stay in the game. She proceeded by getting the next two batters out to end the inning.

UMass would get its only run in the fifth as Mary Duff reached on a bunt attempt that turned into a three-base error when the Vermont third baseman, Shaeffer, threw the ball away. Schilling would then come through with a clutch single to score Duff.

UMass had an opportunity to do more damage in that inning as DellAnno singled Schilling to third. The next play was supposed to be a double steal, with DellAnno breaking for second, but Schilling never moved off third, and DellAnno was out easily.

"I was not really happy with the things we did today," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said.

There would be one last scare by Vermont in the sixth. After Aprile had gotten the first two batters she walked Marcia Dion. Sheaffer then followed with a single, moving Dion to third. Aprile ended the inning quickly by striking out Fritz.

Schilling also made a nice backhanded catch in that sixth that help avoid an ugly situation from developing.

The second game was much more chaotic than the first. In the UMass first the Minutewomen scored two runs on no hits. It all started with a lead off walk to DellAnno. Miller sacrificed her over to second. Meehan walked and then DellAnno and Meehan combined for a double steal. On the play DellAnno was slightly shaken up as she sustained a cut on her hand between the forefinger and middlefinger. She played the rest of the game with no apparent effect.

A wild pitch brought in DellAnno and when the catcher's throw hit the scoring DellAnno. The miscue allowed a heads-up Meehan to score.

Vermont scored its lone run of the day in the top of thesecond. Fritz led off the inn-

Tennis falls to Dartmouth in season finale

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Losing seven out of nine matches may seem like a blowout on paper, but when there is four matches that can go either way, such as there was at Dartmouth yesterday for the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team, it's not so bad.

The Minutewomen dropped four matches in the third and final set to their Big Green counterparts yesterday to drop a 7-2 decision up in Hanover, N.H. UMass fell to 5-6 on the year in its last match of the season.

"The team has not been involved in a lot of three-setters all year," UMass coach Michael Husted said.

One other factor that also plagued UMass' efforts was the absence of Gail Girasella who did not make the trip. Girasella is the No. 2 player for the Minutewomen.

"If she were here, I think that would have helped," Husted said. "She was sorely missed."

Freshman Vanessa Kirchner helped make up for the loss of Girasella though by taking her singles match over Dartmouth's Linda Chung, 6-2, 6-4.

"She played very solidly, very well," Husted said. "She was a little nervous toward the end but she pulled it out. As the year has passed, she has got progressively stronger."

Senior co-captain Karen McShane finished out her collegiate career at UMass, losing to Hilary Jones 6-2, 6-3.

Freshmen Shizuko Yamasaki and Allison Agnew both dropped tough matches. Yamasaki pulled out a tie breaker in the second set (7-4) to even her match with Kristen Daily at one set a piece but was edged in the third set, 6-4 to drop the decision.

Agnew had Wendy Morgan on the ropes, winning the first set, 6-4 but Morgan battled back to take the last two sets, 6-4 and 7-5.

The Minutewomen didn't let the tough losses get them down though as freshmen Tonya Sides and Lynn Gualtieri won their doubles match, 8-4, in the last game of the four and a half hour match.

Put a squeeze on the orange tossing antics

It's Friday, May 8, 1987, a warm and sunny day in Amherst. Nary a cloud in sight, yet things were still falling from the sky.

The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team was playing national power Syracuse University at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The Gorillas, in their biggest game of the year (is it ever not the biggest of the year?), surprised the visitors by storming to a 3-1 lead in the first quarter.

Jim Clark

And then the faithful fans, those maniacs who follow the Gorillas' and are supposed to prove a boost — a kick in the butt, instead gave them a kick in the groin.

The fans, in a visibly-high state of drunkenness, showed their dislike for the Syracuse team by hurling oranges onto the field. Of course, there were no points for originally — this sort of thing follows the Orangemen everywhere they go.

But in this game, the officials took serious objection to the naughty behavior of the McGuirk assembly. And for good reason. The safety of the players on both sides, the coaches and officials was jeopardized by the throwing of any objects on the field.

So the officials took matters into their own hands, promising to penalize UMass every time an orange hit the field. UMass coach Dick Garber and then co-captain Neil 'Fuzzy' Cunningham proceeded across the field to the visitors' stands, where the UMass crowd had congregated.

"You're getting us a penalty every time you throw oranges," Garber pleaded, while Cunningham, a little more bluntly, said, "We're playing our hearts out here and we're winning. Don't blow it for us."

I was a freshman at the time and was at the game. To me the speech seemed to be a moving one, and I thought the UMass fans would comply and refrain from their juvenile conduct.

Make that a naive freshman.

Baseball continues slide, falls to Big Green, 4-3

Struggling Minutemen drop seventh straight

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

HANOVER, N.H. — Both teams are struggling to climb back to the .500 mark. Neither is in the hunt in the respective league title chases.

With flu bugs and cold breezes taking their toll, who would have predicted such a good baseball game. The University of Massachusetts baseball team and Dartmouth College nip-and-tucked through nine windy innings yesterday with the Big Green prevailing, 4-3.

UMass (16-25) had moved the tying run as far as second base in each of the last two innings and threatened seriously in the ninth.

With one out, Drew Seccafico reached on an infield single. Coach Mike Stone sent in Jack Card to run, who moved to second on a botched pickoff attempt. But Derek Dana flied out to left and Dartmouth center fielder Bobby Jones collected Tom Murray's long fly ball to center to end it.

"I don't know the last time we drove somebody in from second with less than two outs," Stone said.

Dartmouth jumped on UMass starter Paul Ciaglo for three runs in the first inning on a collection of, in Stone's own words, "walks, bleeders and errors." Brendan Lesch reached on an infield single and then consecutive walks to Brendan Mahoney and Mark Johnson loaded the bases.

John Owens drove a 2-2 pitch down the right field line, scoring two runs. A sacrifice fly scored Johnson before Caglo recovered with consecutive strikeouts to end the inning.

Ciaglo couldn't respond to the second inning bell, falling to the flu.

"He struggled in the pen and just couldn't continue," Stone said.

Righty Dave Telgheder pitched a one-run ballgame through the final eight innings. UMass scrapped back into it meanwhile, scoring single runs in the second and fourth innings to draw within 3-2.

In the second inning, Brian Bright raked a Chris Hildebrand fastball over the 316 marker in left, giving the freshman outfielder his team-high seventh home run of the season and putting the Minutemen on the board.

In the top of the fourth, senior Steve Kern led off with a double to right-center, and Bright followed with a ground out to short with Kern moving to third on the throw. Freshman Lou Olivieri, the designated hitter, then plated Kern with a sacrifice fly to right.

35 protesters arrested at GRC

Refuse to negotiate with administration

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts State Police shoved protesters aside with billy clubs yesterday, knocking some over, as they attempted to clear a path for the bus carrying 35 arrested protesters, ending the 24-hour occupation of an office in the Graduate Research Center.

Thirty-two people, protesting military-funded research on campus, were wheeled out of the GRC in wheelchairs, and three others arrested outside the building were loaded on to a Pioneer Valley Transit Authority bus.

The police formed a wall around the front of the bus to allow it to pull away from the building without intervention from protesters. A group of about 200 people walked in front of the police in an attempt to slow or potentially stop the bus.

As the police and the PVTA bus were heading south on North Pleasant St., the state police broke into a jog and began waving their clubs. Several protesters running along side the bus, in front of the bus and on the sidewalk were hit, forced on to the sidewalk or knocked to the ground.

The procession continued past the Newman Center and turned right on to Massachusetts Ave. The bus headed to Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium, where protesters were booked and arraigned.

Police blocked off North Pleasant St. from the intersection at Governor's Drive and North Pleasant St. to the Massachusetts Ave. intersection until the area was clear.

"I cannot deny or confirm there was police violence," Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs said. "It was the primary responsibility [of the state police] to surround the bus and help get it away. From what I understand, 40 state police officers had to push people and use the sticks. I think they may have hit some people," he said.

"The whole thing turns my stomach," Madson said.

Attempts to arrest the protesters at dawn were made, but the state police could not be mobilized at that time, said Arthur Hilson, director of public safety.

The 32 protesters arrested inside the building were arraigned with charges of trespassing and the three outside with disorderly conduct, according to Jeanne Hopkins, University spokeswoman. Pretrial conferences are scheduled for September.

The protesters were inside the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Research and Graduate students since about 2 p.m.

Stymied students exit Duffey's office after failed 90-minute takeover effort

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

A 90-minute takeover of University of Massachusetts Chancellor Joseph Duffey's office by 15 students yesterday led to an impromptu meeting between the occupiers and Provost Richard O'Brien.

The students, part of People for a Socially Responsible University, marched into the Whitmore Administration building office at 12:45 p.m. demanding that administrators drop all disciplinary charges filed against people involved in the last two weeks of protesting against military research.

An hour after O'Brien told the occupiers that they would be arrested in 30 minutes and, under "emergency regulations" automatically suspended, the protestors left the building.

Jonathan Leavitt, one of the students, said, "[The administration] isn't willing to do anything for us and to get arrested would have been a waste of my time at this point."

The students apparently caught the administration unaware as UMass police and North guilty on 3 charges

From the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former White House aide Oliver North was found guilty yesterday of illegally destroying documents, accepting an illegal gratuity and aiding and abetting in the obstruction of Congress in the first trial resulting from the Iran-Contra affair.

North, the Marine who was at the heart of the Reagan administration effort to arm Nicaragua's rebels, was fully acquitted on nine other counts.

North sat impassively as US District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell read the verdict. After the judge and jury had left the room, North walked over to his wife, who was sitting nearby, smiled and kissed her.

North lost his pension as a retired Marine officer when he was convicted yesterday and he won't get it back unless the verdict is overturned on appeal, said

Gorillas ready to peel the Orange

UMass to square off against No. 2 team in the nation

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Not a whole lot more needs to be said about tomorrow's men's lacrosse game between the University of Massachusetts and Syracuse University.

All season long, the Gorillas have been building their way up to this climactic finish. Save for one small detour against Cornell, UMass has done its share to make sure that tomorrow's game (1 p.m. at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium) will live up to its expectations.

The Gorillas (12-1) are ranked sixth in the nation and have won their last nine games since the Cornell setback on March 29. And with the exception of Tuesday's night sleepwalk win over Boston College — which they have done their best to totally forget — the Gorillas have been playing well.

But the real story here is the opponent, No. 2 Syracuse. In short, the Orangemen are downright scary. Every so often there is a team with so much talent and firepower, you just have to sit there and shake your head. Syracuse, last year's national champion and a decent bet to win it again this year, is one of those teams.

"They're the best offensive team I've ever seen," said UMass coach Dick Garber, who has seen many a team in his 35 years of coaching.

UMass found out how good the Orangemen were last year, when they tried to be a roadblock in 'Cuse's unbeaten drive to the national title. The Gorillas traveled to the CarrierDome with high hopes of derailing the high-flying Orange train, but instead returned home with a deflating 23-8 loss.

Last year's game was not an isolated instance. This season the Orange have racked up four 20-plus goal games, and all against legitimate teams. They've hit that bonus mark in their last three outings, against Cornell (20-12), Rutgers (27-15) and Pennsylvania (22-1).

The American Manual Alphabet

Drawings show a side view. In actual practice the letters should face the persons with whom you are communicating.

FYI

DASL will be acknowledged on May 8, 1989. DASL (pronounced dazzle) stands for Day of American Sign Language. On that day students, faculty, and staff will be asked to practice sign language or finger spelling as part of the regular communication process. A table will be set up in the Cmapus Center Concourse with information about "signing". Prior to DASL, beginning April 24, 1989, signs and finger spelling will appear in the Collegian for people to practice. On May 5, 1989 and May 8, 1989 the entire American Manual Alphabet will be published. A public meeting to discuss various aspects of ASL relevant to the University will be held on May 9th in CC Room 811B-15 from 7-9 p.m.

DASL follows other events on campus to increase the campus community's awareness about this form of language and the need to offer sign language courses on a regular basis. DASL is also part of an attempt to highlight the fact that May is Better Hearing and Speech month. This event is being sponsored by the Communications Disorders Club, the Committee to Institute American Sign Language, and the Department of Communication Disorders. Anyone interested in participating on the committee should contact Sandra Lindberg at 5-0131.

Women 'take back the night'

By SHARON WILKEY
Collegian Staff

About 80 women last night, in a demonstration of unity and empowerment, marched across the University of Massachusetts to "take back the night."

The UMass students, holding candles and chanting such slogans as "Gay, straight, black, white, safety is a woman's right," walked across campus as the sun set to show that they should not have to fear walking unescorted in the dark.

They said they marched from the Campus Center to a path between Sylvan and Orchard Hill known as "rape road," and later to each of the residential areas, to increase student awareness of the danger women face when walking alone.

"I'm sick and tired of not being able to take a walk at 12 o'clock at night, at 8 o'clock at night, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon," shouted Joanne Gray, co-founder of the Amherst chapter of the National Organization for Women. Gray was also an organizer of the event.

Gray and others spoke to more than 100 men and women at a 7 p.m. rally preceeding the march, to "heighten awareness about violence against women." Gathered on the steps of the Student Union Building, participants sang and recited poems.

One rape survivor was cheered by the crowd when she said a year after her rape, she was learning to take back her self esteem. "That man didn't take anything away from me, and I'm no less of a person than I've ever been," she said.

Gray and others said they were angry because they did not feel safe walking alone on the UMass campus. "We won't lose this anger because we can't," she said. "Our lives depend on it."

Every three minutes, a woman in the United States is raped, said Katharine Daube, an Educator/Advocate at the Everywoman's Center. "It's about time we started making a scene, loudly, proudly, and yes, angrily," she said during the rally.

"Are women not supposed to get angry that because of their gender, they have to live life in fear?" Daube said.

Men present at the rally were asked not to march with the women. "We thank you for your support because this is not a woman's issue, this is a people issue," said Ali Woolwich, a member of NOW.

Woolwich said men were excluded from the march to symbolically blame the perpertrators of rape, who she said are 97 percent male, instead of blaming the victims.

One of the more than 20 men at the rally, UMass sophomore Chi Leung, said, "Women need, at this point, to feel that they have this type of community, and I'm not offended by that at all."

Chanting "Mourn Central Park, Take Back the Dark," the women said they were marching in reaction to the recent gang rape of a 28 year-old woman in the New York park.

Andrea Delgado, a UMass freshman from New York City, said at the rally, "What if it was me?"

Delgado, a member of NOW, said she came to the march because "I'm fed up with those damn double standards. . . .I have as much right as anyone else to walk at night to get some fresh air."

But concern for the safety of all women, not just those whose attacks make national headlines, was echoed by the group.

The women were harassed by three men shouting profanities from Leach residential hall, but the incident did not prevent the continuation of the march.

Race relations upset area colleges

Schools attempt to boost recruitment and enrollment of minorities

By C.C. SANDORFI

and STEPHEN PANGIONE
Collegian Correspondent

Race relations on campuses in the Pioneer Valley have become strained during the last three years, and colleges have tried to address this problem in part by stepping up the recruitment and enrollment of minority students, officials at the colleges said.

The most recent incident occurred at Smith College, where several racially harassing notes caused an uproar on campus and in the community over the past week.

The University of Massachusetts and the other colleges in the Five-College system have had their share of problems, too.

In 1986, UMass made national news with the Southwest brawl, which was deemed by many as racially motivated; and accounts of last year's occupation of New Africa House appeared worldwide.

Amherst College reported racially derogatory notes scrawled on residence hall doors this year, according to Ana Martinez, associate dean of admissions at the school.

In March of 1988, a group of minority students occupied Dakin House at Hampshire College to protest racism on campus.

And Mount Holyoke College, though it has reported fewer racial problems, is not unscathed; last year, anti-Black slurs were written on a building wall, according to students at the college.

The Five colleges are actively recruiting more minority students to promote diversity and understanding on their campuses.

Smith College has created a document to specifically address racism and minority recruitment. "The Smith Design for Institutional Diversity" emerged from a collaboration between students and administrators. The goals set in the Design include the establishment of a civil rights policy, and the attainment by 1998-99 of a student body of traditional age that reflects the racial composition of the national pool of college students in that age group, according to Debra Bradley, news director at the college.

Smith College has made strides toward enrolling more minorities, she said. In 1986, 11 percent of the freshmen class were minority students. In 1988, the figure was up by 19 percent, according to Bradley.

"Estimates are that by the year 2000, one-third of school children will be minority students," said Bradley. "We want Smith to reflect this diversity."

She said that by increasing the numbers of minorities enrolled at the college, students of color will have more support while other students will benefit by learning from other cultures.

Amherst College is also attempting to attract more minorities, using what Martinez calls a "multi-pronged fork."

"We're making a very, very deliberate attempt to get more minorities to apply and to encourage more campus visits," she said.

The college is expanding the recruitment process by increasing its efforts in areas with a high percentage of minorities, such as Miami, the Southwest, and Southern California and metropolitan areas like St. Louis and Washington, she said.

Martinez said the school's recruiters follow up on the recruitment process by tracking all mailings to prospective minority students and encouraging them to enroll.

She said Amherst College is concerned

Racist notes continue to harass Smith

By LAURA KLIVANS
Collegian Correspondent
and the Associated Press

NORTHAMPTON — At least 30 anonymous racist notes have been received by students, staff and faculty members at Smith College in the latest of several such incidents at the school, a spokeswoman said yesterday.

News Director Debra Bradley said the identical notes were discovered Tuesday and have been turned over to the district attorney's office, which has advised the college against revealing their content or characterizing the race of the people who received them.

The notes were found nearly a week after a set of racist letters were pinned to the door of a black student's room. The incident prompted 100 students to march across campus to the office of President Mary Maples Dunn, who denounced the letter as "cowardly and despicable."

Hart: BOG has gone far to deal with problems

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Under the leadership of Eric Nakajima, Joe Casali, and Liz Hart, the Board of Governors has come a long way in separating itself from campus politics, said Hart, Board vice chairperson.

"When I came on two years ago, [the Board of Governors] was a tremendously political group with a left bias," Hart said. "We forgot our true mission of getting concrete and physical problems dealt with in the Student Union and the Campus Center."

"We changed that by encouraging the governors to be more concerned with basic issues, like handicapped facilities and food services," she said. "Not enough praise can be given, primarily to [Nakajima], for that."

Hart said that credit also needs to be given to several governors, including Bruce Ledoux, Joe Cutrone, Kirk Merrow, Bari Jaffe, Jeff Glassman, Bonnie LaMadeleine, Katherine Byrnes, and Scott Jordan for their "initiative."

As a member of the Undergraduate Student Senate, Hart said the primary difference between the two groups is the Board can overcome its political differences.

"We have staunch conservatives and burning liberals," she said. "But there is a mutual level of respect of each ideology no matter what the issue. I feel sometimes the Senate does not have that, which is unfortunate."

"It's that which makes me most proud of the Board of Governors," she said.

Newly-elected chairperson Charlotte Carter agreed with Hart.

"I'm optimistic [about the Board] because of the enthusiasm that's been shown," said Carter. "Most governors are interested in new projects. They're not just here to show their face on Thursday nights."

Carter said she sees the Board working more closely in the coming year.

"To be good externally, you have to be good internally," she said.

In other news:

- In what Gov. Joe Casali said was a surprising move, the Graduate Student Senate informed the Board that they want to withdraw their usual contribution of $29,400 to the Board budget.

In a memo to the Board, the GSS listed more space, a tuition waiver for graduate students working on the Board, and a statement from the space allocation committee as to how groups practicing discriminatory acts, such as the Republican Club, will be dealt with as reasons for the pulling of funds.

Casali said the withdrawal of GSS funds is a "breach of contract," and will be addressed by Board members at next Tuesday's GSS meeting.

Woman says officer kicked car during military protest

A woman whose car received damage during yesterday's anti-military research protest said she reported to campus police that an officer kicked her brown Toyota Tercel.

Xuefei Zhang was driving northward on North Pleasant Street when a crowd of shouting people, state troopers and a bus transporting 32 arrested protesters approached from the opposite way, she said. She tried to make a three-point turn, but was not quick enough and a trooper kicked her car's fender, she said.

"At the time, I was very scared," Zhang said. "My wheel was already touching the curb and I could not back up."

Asked whether a complaint had been filed, a campus police spokesman said it sounded familiar. "That's confidential information between her and us," he added.

Kurt Wise, a bystander, said he saw state troopers roll Zhang's car back as police and the bus approached. But Wise said he did not see a trooper kick the vehicle.

The Tercel's right-hand side front fender has a dent with marks that resemble those of a rubber sole.

Zhang, who emigrated to the United States from China two years ago, said she was driving home from her job at a nursing home.

various other officers were busy arresting the occupiers of the Graduate Research Center.

"Fifteen minutes ago I was watching people get arrested," said Leavitt, once inside the Chancellor's office. "I figured this would be a better step in meeting our demands."

At 1 p.m., Provost O'Brien walked in and said, "If you've got any message I'll be happy to hear it. If not, we've got problems. What are you doing here?"

Leavitt, seated in the chancellor's swivel chair, proceeded to read the students' demands.

O'Brien said that the students "have full democratic rights to dissent, not to take over offices."

A discussion followed concerning the control the administration has over Department of Defense-funded research on campus.

O'Brien said the Board of Trustees approves policy regarding research and sets restrictions on what campus research can be funded.

"The faculty can add to these restrictions. It is a faculty decision, not mine," said O'Brien. "Research grants are in our domain and we are willing to address them in a spirit of non-coercive discussion."

The students were locked in the office after the provost left.

"They will be arrested with whatever police available," O'Brien said.

Daria Casinelli, an occupier, said she and others presented another set of demands concerning "police and administrative misconduct" before leaving the building. She said O'Brien refused to discuss these demands.

Outside the chancellor's office, 40 students gathered and chanted in support of the occupiers, shouting "We want Joe."

Jonathan Frank, a supporter and former president of the Graduate Student Senate, said he believes the occupation was a good way of meeting the demands.

"[The students] have to keep pressing. Continual escalation is the way to go. [The administration] doesn't know what to do," said Frank.

Brian Harris, an undergraduate who was sitting in the lobby of Whitmore, said that the University "can't drop the charges if the protestors obviously broke the law."

"I have nothing against the cause, but if they take action like that, they have to be willing to suffer the consequences," said Harris.

Wednesday. The group presented a modified demand and suggestions for the implementation of the demand to the administration.

The demand was a halt of Defense Department research at the University. Accompanying the demand were the suggestions to make all research documentation accessible in the library, to form a student-faculty committee to discuss alternative sources of funding and to give the police training in how to deal with non-violent protesters.

Administrators, faculty and student representatives and Arthur Hilson met in the Whitmore Administration Building to discuss the protesters' demands.

Harlan Sturm, chairman of the rules committee of the Faculty Senate, told the protesters that research documents would be available in the library.

He told them the formation of an ad hoc committee of the Faculty Senate or a commission to explore the possibility of economic conversion would be discussed at yesterday's emergency meeting of the Faculty Senate.

The protesters refused the administration's offer. Sturm told them the administration would meet with the group yesterday morning in the Campus Center if they left the building. The protesters declined, and said they would meet with Paul Tsongas and the administration in the research office.

"It is not appropriate for the administration to make demands for the faculty," Provost Richard O'Brien said. "It is up to the faculty to decide whether it should or should not make funds available for the research."

The protesters chose to remain in GRC overnight. They did not have access to food until about 4:30 a.m. Arthur Hilson said he would bring in food provided by 40 supporters camped outside the building if the demonstrators made concessions.

"I wanted them to be cooperative," he said. The group did not make concessions, but "I decided to let them have food," Hilson said.

"It was an extraordinary request and one we didn't seriously pursue," Jim Langley, vice chancellor for relations and development. "Our intention is to be as lenient as possible."

Jo-Anne Thomas Vanin, dean of students, read the picketing code to the UMass undergraduate protesters, and told them they were violating it. She then explained that if they chose to remain in the building and were arrested, they would be immediately suspended from the the University. She said they had 24 hours to contact the dean of students office to take the necessary steps toward reinstatement.

"It is highly likely a fee would be assessed by the bursar's office to cover the cost of the arrests and calling in additional forces from the town of Amherst, UMass-Boston and the state police," Hopkins said. She said it is also possible the group would be fine for the use of the Xerox, facsimile and other machines in the office.

Samuel Conti, dean of graduate students, told the graduate students who were protesting that they too would be suspended if they were arrested.

The protesters who were not UMass students were informed that they would be banned from UMass if they did not leave the building. Madson said the cost of the occupation of Memorial Hall was over $25,000.

The use of wheelchairs to remove the protestors is a new concept at UMass, for both the demonstrators and the police. University Health Services loaned the wheelchairs to the administration, Madson said.

Student leaders at the University were outraged when they heard the protesters would be suspended from the University.

"We couldn't stay and let them be suspended without due process," Tracy Davis, president of the Student Government Association. "We don't agree with the decisions by the dean."

Several students outside the building were extremely upset by the occupation. "My life revolves around this building and these people are screwing it up," said Kevin Bedard, a senior COINS major.

"There's work I have to do in the building and professors I have to see, and I can't get in. There are better ways to get their point across than occupying a building, they're putting people out of the building who aren't involved."

with providing an equitable distribution of minority students.

"If a liberal arts college [like Amherst] is going to be representative of this nation, it should have the population to reflect this," Martinez said.

As a result of the school's efforts, minority enrollment this year was up 12 percent from last year, although the total number of students enrolled was lower than usual, she said.

Mount Holyoke College is using a similar strategy by recruiting students in areas like Memphis and New York City, according to Gloria Maxwell, assistant director of minority recruitment. School officials also utilized public television in their efforts by broadcasting a tape promoting the Five-College area in general and Mount Holyoke in particular, Maxwell said.

The plan has had some success, Maxwell said; minority applications this year are up 11 percent from last year, she said.

Maxwell said it is now more important than ever to recruit minorities.

"People thought the racial problems of the 60s were over, but the last few years indicate that racism is still around," she said. "People have to realize that everyone is equal. If we bring more minorities into school, there will be more interaction and people will [better] understand each other."

The college is also working more actively with minority alumni to secure more leads, she said.

The school is also offering a special student orientation for incoming minority students and their parents, she said.

Hampshire College has taken an even more personal approach to recruitment.

Kendall Clauson, the minority recruitment director at Hampshire, has visited "scores" of high school nationwide to recruit minority students. Clauson said most of the schools she visited had minority enrollments of at least 30 percent.

The approach is working, said Clauson. Last year, 188 minorities applied; this year, the mid-season total of minority applications had already reached 206, she said.

"We want to get minority students the opportunity for an education," she said. "There's diversity in the world, and there should be diversity in school."

UMass is also actively recruiting more minority students, according to Timm Rinehart, Director of Admissions. The University has generated new leads by purchasing the names of 14,000 East coast minority high school seniors who are college bound, he said.

In additior., UMass hosted a three-day colloquium of high school guidance counselors from across the country to discuss minority issues and the recruitment of minority students, he said.

Rinehart said UMass followed up on every lead by sending each accepted minority students a special brochure and by speaking with each student over the phone. The students were also invited to an open house, he said.

"Our goal is to attract more minority students. I would give minority students a fair chance to get educational access on campus and [to promote] diversity," he said.

College administrators told 2,800 students at a meeting Monday that District Attorney Judd Carhart was investigating the notes, to be sent to the state crime laboratory for handwriting and fingerprint testing.

At another campus meeting Tuesday at a student dormitory, a note from President Dunn was read that said in part: "Remember, we must not let these people control us. Show them we are stronger than they are."

In a related story, the campus gave their stamp of approval to a set of recommendations to the school's Committee on Academic Policy. The recommendations, proposed by minority students to curb racism on campus, were approved by 68 percent of 2,430 students. The two-day vote concluded Wednesday.

Although administrators are optimistic about their programs, students reaction is split.

"I'm very concerned about whether the college will live up to its commitment," said Michelle Mance, co-chair of the Black Students Alliance at Smith. "The issue is that the implementation of a policy like [the Smith Design] is the only proof in the pudding. We'll see in five years whether the college will live up to its promises."

Some students at UMass are even more critical. "I think it's a bunch of baloney," said Monique Taban, a worker in the Third World Affairs office at UMass said, "I don't think [UMass] will try to make a conscious effort."

Taban said she thinks the school is more interested in recruiting middle-class students who can afford college than in recruiting minorities, who often have more financial difficulty.

"I think UMass is catering to suburbia," she said. "I don't think their concern is for minorities. Because they often have lower incomes and poorer high school educations, they can't compete (with middle-class applicants)."

Taban said she thinks minority recruitment efforts at UMass are made simply to appease people who are questioning low minority enrollment.

Although some students may criticize the efforts of their administrations, most agree that more minority recruitment is necessary.

Lena Gamble, a student at Mount Holyoke, said she supported her school's actions. "There are not a lot [of minority students] here now, but I do believe [Mt. Holyoke] is making a good effort," she said. "I think it's a great idea. They should try to recruit more minorities, because a lot don't believe they have the opportunity to go anywhere."

The colleges are all planning to continue increasing their efforts, according to the administrations.

Mance said she'd believe the promises of her school when she saw an increase in minorities on campus. Until then, she said, "What we have to do is have great expectations."

Changes for Cuban women, poet says

By SCOTT ROE
Collegian Staff

About 50 people gathered in Herter Hall yesterday to listen to Cuban poet Nancy Moirejon tell about the difficulties women writers from her country face.

Morejon, who was born in Havana, said that when she began to write and become accepted as a poet in the 1960s most of her fellow writers were male. But as changes took place in Cuban society and women began to become more educated, the number of female poets increased.

"Now I think there are more young female poets in Cuba than male poets," she said.

The new, younger female poets of the 1980s are more aware of issues concerning women than Morejon and her fellow women writers of the 60s were, she said. But according to Morejon the younger poets risk reducing their potential as writers by focusing solely on women's issues. They should approach literature from both a women's and a universal perspective, she said.

Obvious differences exist in the ways male and female Cuban writers approach their work, Morejon said.

"I think that male poetry is more conformist, and female poetry in itself is a challenge," she said.

Morejon said she believes she and other female Cuban writers share a common historical bond with minority women in America, in the ways in which they have been treated historically. Her country, its history, and the political and social changes that have taken place, have been influences on her work. she said.

"I do feel I am part of the Caribbean, and I feel that I am part of the Caribbean as a women," Morejon said.

1989 SENIOR LEADERSHIP AWARD

The following members of the Class of 1989 were nominated by faculty, staff and students as outstanding leaders on campus. The Alumni Office and the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs would like to acknowledge these seniors for their contributions to the University community while undergraduates at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

■ North guilty on 3 counts

Army Lt. Col. Linda Dumoulin, a Pentagon spokeswoman.

North, who retired as a lieutenant colonel in the Marine Corps with 20 years of active-duty service, has been drawing an annual military pension of roughly $23,100 since leaving the corps almost exactly a year ago.

At the time of his retirement, North said he was leaving the service in order to better prepare his defense against charges of misconduct stemming from the Iran-Contra affair.

Upon the conviction becoming legally effective — when the secretary of the Navy is formally notified of it and the paperwork is completed — North will lose his pension, she said. If North wins on appeal, he will get the pension back and will be given pay retroactively, she said.

The jurors in the North trial did a "lot of bickering and arguing" but finally agreed to convict the former White House aide on three counts after a "strong prayer," one juror said yesterday.

"It was tough to come up with a decision," Earl F. Williams told reporters.

Most of the jurors declined to discuss the deliberations, saying they were tired and wanted time with their families. The jury had been sequestered since April 20.

Juror Justine Newell Parrish said that reaching a verdict was the hardest decision she had ever had to make.

Now, she said, "I just want to be with my family."

Williams, a former security guard, said the jury did not agree on the guilty counts until yesterday, the 12th day of deliberations, although some of the acquittals had been decided earlier.

"The jury was split a while on some of the counts, and in a case such as this there is a lot of bickering and arguing," he said. "It was touch and go all the way."

The 12 charges and the jury's verdict

WASHINGTON (AP) — Here are the 12 felony charges against former national Security Council aide Oliver L. North and the jury's verdicts on each.

All carry five-year prison terms and fines up to $250,000 except as noted.

1. Obstruction of Congress in Sept. and Oct. 1985: Not guilty.
2. False statements to Congress on Sept. 5, 1985: Not guilty.
3. False statements to Congress on Sept. 12, 1985: Not guilty.
4. False statements to Congress on Oct. 7, 1985: Not guilty.
5. Obstruction of Congress in Aug. 1986: Not guilty.
6. Aiding and abetting obstruction of Congress in Nov. 1986: Guilty. The jury did not find North guilty of obstruction of Congress on this charge, but did find him guilty of the subsidiary charge of aiding and abetting.
7. Obstruction of a presidential inquiry in Nov. 1986: Not guilty.
8. False statements on Nov. 23, 1986: Not guilty.
9. Destroying or falsifying government documents, three-year imprisonment and $250,000 fine: Guilty.
10. Receipt of an illegal gratuity, two-year imprisonment and $250,000 fine: Guilty.
11. Conversion of traveler's checks to personal use, 10-year imprisonment, $250,000 fine: Not guilty.
12. Conspiracy to defraud the Treasury and the Internal Revenue Service: Not guilty.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writers as indicated and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Punishment will not pacify

On Wednesday, yet another building on our campus was taken over by students from People for a Socially Responsible University. The Graduate Research Center take-over marked the third in a series of protests against the military-funded research going on here at the University.

When students were arrested last week after occupying Memorial Hall for two days, they were grossly mistreated by the administration. The administration threatened to fire all Teaching Assistants involved in the protests and to suspend those graduate students involved.

During these protests, the plumbing had been turned off in these buildings, all toilet facilities shut down, and once the protesters were in the buildings, the doors were locked.

These protesters should not have been threatened with expulsion from the University, nor should their jobs have been threatened. They have been protesting peacefully and have been treated like animals locked up in cages.

The administration has shown a lack of cooperation and fair judgment during these protests. It has been thin-skinned in its ability to withstand criticism. Instead of trying to understand the reasons behind all of this outrage that has lead to building occupations, the administration is attempting to simply punish the protesters. This will not solve the problem, it will anger people more.

We support the right of the students to protest. The protesters must be regarded with respect. Civil disobedience can not be treated as simply an inconvenience by the administration, but an affirmation of the seriousness of these protesters' concerns regarding where our funds are coming from.

The administration must deal with the protesters instead of punishing them and acting like a parent.

In successful company

Donald Trump, Roger Clemens, J.P. Morgan, Abbie Hoffman, George Bush, Mikhail Gorbachev, Axl Rose, Robert DeNiro, Henry David Thoreau, Hunter S. Thompson, Lawrence Taylor, David Letterman and F. Scott Fitzgerald all have one unifying factor in common . . . success.

Cosmo Macero

The desire to (fueled by the pressure to) succeed is fundamental to our popular concept of the 'American Dream,' ideally defined by Trump, Morgan and the like. So what are Abbie Hoffman, Hunter Thompson and Mikhail Gorbachev doing in the same paragraph as these overtly capitalistic, semi-jingoistic larger-than-life type fellas?

Measuring success can be done at multiple levels, from different angles, with varying standards. The Cy Young Award is the pinnacle achievement for Major League pitchers, while an Oscar rewards excellence for an actor or actress. Leaving aside the fact that disgusting sums of money usually follow the awarding of such an honor, it must be understood that success is not solely measured by monetary gain. Fame and fortune don't always go hand in hand, just ask Mother Theresa.

How we measure success is determined by what we deem important. To an aspiring poet, success may be an unpaid publication in a literary journal, while a budding screenwriter may shoot for a major studio production of his script, and the lucrative contract deals that come attatched.

A political activist like the late Abbie Hoffman would most likely be pleased with the fact that he had done his part to see that an injustice be exposed, and an attempt had been made to right whatever wrong was being addressed.

While we're on the subject of Hoffman, the banning of CIA recruitment on campus (for better or, to be honest, for worse) was a successful undertaking by student activists. By the same token, it would be unfair to deem "Cutback City" anything but successful, because it has addressed perhaps the most pertinent issue affecting students, and those involved have exhibited a genuine devotion to the cause.

Success is specialized, and in many cases, individualized. The Superbowl Champions succeed through teamwork, but within the team, are 22 successful individual performances.

Becoming successful is usually the result of concentration in a particular discipline. Very few people are known merely for who they are, but rather for what they do. When Patrick Ewing was heralded as 'the next Russell,' the reference was clearly to Bill, not Nipsy.

Is there a formula for success? Probably not. If you're good at something, that's what you'll most likely succeed at. Then again, if you suck at something, you just might receive as much notoriety as the next guy. Cases in point: Sylvester Stallone, Bon Jovi, Ted Kennedy/Dan Quayle/Barney Frank, Bob Uecker . . . think about it, there's a whole slew of chumps turned champs. Remember the Sex Pistols? Heck, they were four downtrodden, disgusting smacked-out punks, yet they produced probably one of the greatest albums of all time. Somewhere along the line, they did something right.

Should we all strive to achieve success? Of course. Nobody wants to be a loser their whole life. Define your goal. Chairman of the Board at a large multi-national corporation, Editor-in-Chief of a big city daily, high-school math teacher, environmental scientist, night manager at 7-Eleven . . . whatever. Success, on any level, will put you in good company. And that's where most of us belong.

Cosmo Macero Jr. is a Collegian staff member gunning for an upper-level editorial position

Losing support and grade points

Military research on this campus is wrong. I truly believe that. Having students research and work on substances that could cause their own annihilation is a warped act.

Budget cuts should be protested. The louder the plea, the greater the chance for funding. More funding will create a better university to educate future leaders. To the people fighting for these issues, my heart goes out to you.

Yes, I still have a problem with the protests that took place Wednesday evening. I went to the Physical Science Library to find the building closed. It seemed that the police locked the building after protestors occupied a hall in it.

When protestors took over Memorial Hall last week, I was proud of them and the spirit they were representing at this university. I was encouraged by the empathy and the courage of the people whose generation I am a part of.

Last year, the New Africa House was occupied by minority students demanding their rights. I was awed by their intensity and strength. I prayed for them to accomplish their goals.

When you are left with no other option, civil disobedience is the only choice you have to make yourself heard. When buildings such as the New Africa House and Memorial Hall are occupied, those of us not directly involved can stand aside and watch, learning from our peers. Yet, when an entire library is shut down, it is not the administration nor the decision-makers that feel the wrath of protest. It is the students.

Students needed books for research papers, computer time that is already difficult to attain, and some just needed a quiet place to study. That is the main reason to be here at UMass, studying.

A man that was at the Physical Science Library yelled at a protestor, asking her why she had to do this, why she had to close a library. She told him to talk to the police, they were the ones that locked the doors.

I think she was mistaken. Her protest, as passive as it may have been, closed a library. It was her actions that deprived others of a resource they needed.

I wish the protestors luck in their causes and their positive beliefs, but I ask them to choose their stage, their soapbox, their building, more responsibly. They may lose support when others lose grade points.

Can vitamin C help players?

The Setting: Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The Teams: the University of Massachusetts Gorillas and the Syracuse Orangemen. The Problem: oranges flying across the field. I remember when UMass played Syracuse in McGuirk Stadium two years ago, and I also remember the Gorillas jumping off to an early lead. Unfortunately, we were unsuccessful.

One of the most important factors in any game is the crowd. After the Gorillas started to take off, the crowd began to cheer them on in more ways than one. Besides the usual razzing of the opposition, numerous oranges were thrown onto the field, aimed at Syracuse team members.

This may have been funny and had good intentions for UMass, but it only resulted in disaster. Because the referees had to continuously stop the game to clean the field and warn the fans, UMass lost all of its momentum. Also, after repeated pleas from the officials to stop, UMass was penalized for each "orange" infraction. The Gorillas wound up losing the game.

Tomorrow, the Gorillas have the chance to not only become the number one or two team in the nation, but to also avenge this loss at home to Syracuse. What I'd like to see tomorrow (and I'm sure the team would agree) is an energetic game both on the part of the players and by the crowd. Cheering UMass and heckling Syracuse will help, but please leave the oranges in the D.C. — they will only impede the efforts of the Gorillas and annoy everyone on the field. Yell all you want and have a good time. All I ask is that we prevent a repeat of the last home match with Syracuse by saving the fruit for after UMass wins.

Vitamin C can help the players, but not when it's airborne.

Faculty challenge administration

We support student opposition to military weapons research on campus and their actions against the degradation of the University due to budget cuts and tuition increases.

We oppose the use of force to stop dissent and have grave concern about administrative threats and summary punishment of students, faculty and staff.

Should any students be suspended or expelled, as faculty members, we will continue to teach these students and challenge the authority of administrators to punish students for political actions against weapons research and budget cuts.

Historic ... will rebuild from ashes

By Richard Sasson
The Patriot Ledger

WESTWOOD — Dominic Marinelli of Walpole, president of the 92-year-old Norfolk Golf Club on East Street, vowed yesterday to rebuild the clubhouse that was destroyed in a $100,000, three alarm fire over the weekend.

Marinelli said the golf course will reopen in a couple of days and the clubhouse will be rebuilt.

"It's a disappointment," he said. "The building has been there a lot of years and there's a lot of history to it. But we'll come out of it. The club will survive like it has in the past."

No members were in the club during the fire which started near the club's function room at a.m. yesterday, leaving only the shop and a section of locker room standing, John J. Sheehy said.

Heads that talk and shine featured at UPC show

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Staff

As the prospect of heaps of term papers and finals looms ominously on the horizon, and considering that most of you lot only work on Sundays, the campus pond concert is perhaps the last place you want to be this weekend. But you know, sometimes you've just got to say "fuck it" dis your duties and follow your inclinations, and when we're talking about a lineup that includes the funky half of Talking Heads, and one of NY's best dub rappers, its pretty much obvious that you're not going to take the road "less travelled on" unless you're a complete prat.

While the name Shinehead might conjure up images of Yul Brynner and The Three Stooges to the "not knowing," all you trendy bastards will recognize him as the guy who raps oh so cool on Sly and Robbie's fantabulous "Boops (Here to Go)." His current solo LP Unity includes the skankin' single, "Don't Give Me No Crack" and received mucho critical acclaim on its release, especially from the British Music Press.

Headlining the show will be the Tom Tom Club, the band formed by the husband and wife rhythm section of Talking Heads, Tina Weymouth and Chris Frantz. Their first single, "Wordy Rappinghood" was released in 1980. Taken from the band's self-titled debut album it was a big fave in European clubs, and was closely followed by the brilliantly trippy groove of "Genius of Love" which was accompanied on release by an innovative animated video produced by Rocky Morton and Annabel Jankel. The creative partnership went on to direct Max Headroom and the stylish 1988 remake of D.O.A.. They also released a cover version of "Under the Boardwalk" in this year.

In '81, Tom Tom Club hit the road initially with Heads musicians Alex Weir and Bernie (Parliament) Worrel in tow, but on the European leg, Worrell was replaced on keys by Tyrone Downie.

Taking a break from the project in 1982, to record Speaking in Tongues with fellow Heads David Byrne and Jerry Harrison, The Club returned to the studio in '83 to record their second LP, Close to the Bone which, though not as successful as the first, was nevertheless consistently quirky and interesting.

Chris and Tina then shelved the project for three years, working on Talking Heads albums Little Creatures and the now legendary concert LP/video, Stop Making Sense.

1986 saw the band working on Mary Lambert's vacuous thriller, Siesta for which, if you remember, Miles Davis and Marcus Miller wrote a pretty unmemorable score. One of their songs "Challenge of the Love Warriors" would later turn up on the band's third LP, Boom Boom Chi Boom Boom in '88, which was in turn rereleased with new tracks when the Club switched labels from Island to Sire/Reprise in early '89.

The band are currently on a club tour of N. America with a new lineup featuring Mark Roule and Gary Pozner. And you can catch 'em on Sunday afternoon at the campus pond, along with the aforementioned Shinehead, The Hooters and Stevie B. The concert is sponsored by UPC.

Bad crop of spring films

By JIM COLE
Collegian Staff

I've racked my brains to try to come up with a decent topic for this week's column. The offerings in the film world are so abysmal lately that it ends up a good topic after all.

Truly, the pre-summer doldrums are upon us. With the exception of Field of Dreams, Kevin Costner's magical film that should not be missed (and which is now playing locally), the first three weeks in May are a frightening time. Here are some of the inspiring titles:

THE SCREENING ROOM

Loverboy. Patrick Dempsey (Can't Buy Me Love) stars as a Beverly Hills Pizza boy who, after being dumped by his girlfriend, suddenly brings romance to the lonely lives of gorgeous housewives — just by delivering a large pepperoni. Featuring heavyweights like Kate Jackson, Kirstie Alley, and Carrie Fisher, and director Joan Micklin Silver, who scored previously with Crossing Delnancy, it still sounds like a must miss.

Listen to Me. This flick looks into the exciting world . . . of debating. That's right, debating. The film, set at college, follows the lives and loves of three students: Kirk Cameron, Jami Gertz, and Tim Quill. Each has some horrible secret from their past, and each wonders if they have the skills and guts to make it in the profession. Honestly, the plot does sound original, but I just can't deal with Kirk Cameron, and the film's presskit states that "he exhibits his talents in a more serious, sensitive, and dimensional light." Sure. The real crime is putting a T.V. actor like him up against Roy Scheider as his debate coach.

The film might be worth the price of admission, but that's up to you. Right now, I don't have the money to risk it.

Horror Show. Yes, another gorefest. There aren't really any actors worthy of mention starring in it. In fact, the best indication of how bad it must be is the credits themselves. The film was co-written by Alan Smithee. There is no such writer. "Alan Smithee" is the pseudonym real writers use when they don't want their name left on the film credits; usually because the final film butchered their script, or the film is just terrible, or most often, both. Spare yourself.

K-9. I already mentioned this one a while back. It sounded like a dog, and reviews proved me right. It is. Jim Belushi isn't funny enough to save this one. Avoid at all costs.

Winter People. It sounded good, combining Kurt Russell and Kelly McGillis in a love story set in the poor Appalachian Mountains in the '20's, but it's supposedly cliched and simplistic, and hasn't been a critic's favorite. Wait for the videocassette.

On the subject of video, some worthy titles you may have missed are now on the shelves:

Parents. Set in the '50's, a horror-comedy about a young boy convinced his all-American parents are cannibals. Interesting.

The Wizard of Loneliness. Another period piece set in 1944 Vermont, about spoiled Wendall Oler (Lucas Haas) adjusting to country life. Beautiful locations and terrific acting make the simple story memorable.

Danny the Champion of the World. This one was never in the theaters, but it is on cable; the Disney Channel, to be precise. Based on Roald Dahl's 1975 children's book, it was filmed in Scotland and stars Jeremy Irons and his real-life son, Sam. It premieres May 7th.

Comedy group does requests

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

I never considered Susan B. Anthony to be much of a commedienne, and neither do the performers in the Susan B. Anthony Improv COMEDY Troupe. So why the name?

COMEDY

"It just kind of happenned," explained troupe member Susan Pasquantonio. "We had a gig to do, but we didn't have a name. Susan B. Anthony's got this quote, 'Failure is impossible', which we all liked so we named ourselves after her. Then we lived on after that gig so we had to keep the name. We're not a feminist group or anything."

Two of the original six members left after that first gig at a coffeehouse in the University of Massachusetts Theater department. The other four members, Jonathan Duquette, Katie Edwards, Eric Martellini, and Pasquantonio, are still going strong. They will be performing this Friday night at 8pm at the Southside room in Hampden Commons in Southwest. Admission is free.

If you've seen this talented young group before, at the Hatch or the Iron Horse, it will be worth your while to see them again. Their skits are different for every show. "We take suggestions from the audience and form a skit around them," Pasquantonio said, adding that the skits may also include singing.

The group of UMass theater majors has been together for about a year. All but Martellini are seniors, but he is going to take a leave from school so that the independent group can take their act on the road "to see what the scene looks like."

Pasquantonio explained that many of their skits resemble those you may see on SCTV or Saturday Night Live. "We don't lean towards political humor, it's just comedy," she said. "It depends on the stuff the audience gives us. If we get raunchy stuff from them, we'll take it, usually it's just clean comedy."

Response to the group thus far has been positive. Even the usually rambunctious Hatch crowd was very receptive to them. Check them out . . . you'll at least get your money's worth.

Cinco de Mayo: an excuse for a major fiesta

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Looking for a little fiesta? Then Twister's Tavern is the place for you this Friday night. Twister's will be celebrating the Mexican holiday "Cinco de Mayo" (5th. of May).

"It's kind of a Mexican Independence Day," explained Twister's owner Mark Forsyth.

Forsyth is originally from California, where, along with most southern states, the holiday is celebrated with great festivities. "We're trying to educate the public and introduce the holiday to the area. There seems to be a large Latin American population in the area, and hopefully we'll turn this into a yearly thing," he said.

He quickly added, "Any excuse for a party."

"Cinco de Mayo" is celebrated to commemorate the day in 1862 when the poorly armed Mexican army won a surprise victory over the invading French in the town of Puebla.

In Mexico, the day is celebrated with an all out party, or fiesta. Streets are closed off and decorated lavishly. People eat, drink, and dance. Tortillas and margaritas are the main staples, as people dress up in colorful traditional Mexican clothing and flamenco dance. The holiday makes our New Year's Eve look like nothing more than a pajama party.

At Twister's, the event will mark the opening of their new outdoor terrace which has a full bar and dining room. Mexican food and beer (Corona and Tecate) will be on special, as will margaritas. In the case of rain, the event will be held in their downstairs room. There will be no cover charge, so you have no excuse to not head over there and flamenco the night away.

Crew teams head to Worcester

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Correspondent

This weekend, teams from all over New England will travel to Worcester to compete in the New England Championships. A team does not have to qualify for the Championships, as it is an open meet; but, in order to qualify for the Nationals in Philadelphia, a crew must do well here. UMass will have all their boats in attendance in Worcester, and several should prove competative.

The women's varsity eight is looking to do exceptionally well. They have been quick and powerful all season, and plan to continue on Saturday. "They have seen all the competition they're going to get this year. They're looking to win," said coach Dave Trond.

Their only loss came to Mt. Holyoke college last weekend. Beacuse Mt. Holyoke races in a different league it will not be present, the women were looking for a rematch and unfortunately will not get it.

The men's light weight race should be the most exciting for the UMass crews. Three or four of the top lightweight crews in the country come from the Northeast. These lightweights are one tough team. "It should come down to a rematch between us and Tufts, but I think we'll win," said Trond.

Tufts is the only crew to beat the lightweights all season.

Trond is implementing a new strategy; he has broken up the heavyweight eight and made a strong four. "I'm really excited about the debut of our four. I think we'll hold our own, coming in at least in the top three."

The championships take place in Worcester and begin at around 9:30 and last all day.

"The Can" can't: Boyd put on shelf with new blood clot

BOSTON (AP) — Dennis "Oil Can" Boyd of the Boston Red Sox was admitted to University of Massachusetts Medical Center in Worcester yesterday for treatment of another blood clot near the right shoulder.

Dr. Arthur Pappas, the team physician, said an angiogram showed the blood clot was "in a similar location" as two clots which sidelined the right-handed pitcher last August.

Pappas notified the club that Boyd had been admitted to the hospital and enzyme treatment had begun to dissolve the clot.

Boyd was placed on the disabled list effective May 1, when he pitched seven innings and was the winner in a 13-6 victory over the Twins in Minnesota.

General Manager Lou Gorman said he was considering his options in replacing Boyd on the 24-man roster. The Red Sox could move veteran Mike Smithson from the bullpen to a starting role and recall a reliever from Pawtucket of the International League. They also could call up rookie Eric Hetzel as a starter.

Boyd, 2-1 with a 5.72 earned run average in five starts this season, left the Red Sox in Chicago and flew home Wednesday night. He complained of pain in the arm when he attempted a routine between-starts warmup.

The Red Sox reported that the blood clot was detected when Boyd went to the hospital yesterday. It was confirmed by the angiogram.

A symbol of the Minutemen's subpar season has been the play of junior power hitting first baseman/designated hitter Drew Comeau. So far this year Comeau has collected only six home runs. You may not think that that is a terrible number but consider the fact that in half a season last year he collected twelve and broke the UMass career home run record with 21 in only two years. His fielding has been below average at first but that's really reflective of the entire team.

Pitcher Paul Ciaglo is painfully aware of this fact when he recalls a Saturday afternoon at the University of Rhode Island. Two errors caused Ciaglo to get a loss while pitching a no-hitter.

"I knew we had holes," said Stone, "but I didn't know they were this big."

Perhaps the big guy above could do the Minutemen another small favor and send them Jody Reed.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You will have to come to terms with certain limitations before you can score new career triumphs. Your work gets more creative and interesting as the week winds down. Give your imagination free rein.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Look forward to new professional triumphs in the near future. You may receive important financial news over the weekend. Be prepared to travel on short notice. Someone at a distance needs your support.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) There is something mysterious about your attraction to a newcomer, making your relationship all the more exciting. The outdoors inspires you. Go horseback riding or camping. Regular exercise helps reduce tension.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22) Your high ideals are sometimes hard to live up to. Relationships of all kinds, from casual to very intimate, find expression this month. Take a short trip to revisit a favorite place.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept. 22) Avoid undercooked foods or over-the-counter drugs that might upset your system. Greater financial freedom lies just ahead. Romance affects almost every decision you make now. Do not act too dependent.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct. 22) Stop ... think twice before signing a ... lease and moving to a new residence. Return phone calls promptly or you could miss a golden career opportunity. Influential people have no time to waste.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov 21) A conciliation attempt will probably succeed today. You are better equipped to deal with a financial or career matter than in the past. Stand up for your rights.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22-Dec. 21) Others are impressed with your creative talents. Your ambition grows–and so does your confidence. Your accomplishments will receive wider public recognition in the near future. Enjoy the limelight.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Greater peace of mind will be yours when you accept the fact that it is impossible to please everyone. Take children on a short trip and show them another side of life.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Constantly criticizing a child is counterproductive. Focus on what the youngster is doing right. Dividends accrue. Continue to build savings. New investment offers deserve careful scrutiny. Rely on experts' advice only.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Your confidence gets a boost when you meet a challenge head-on and emerge victorious. Travel produces a delightful new affiliation. Keep in touch with people who share your interests and ideals.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) You will be content to watch from the sidelines at a sporting event. A trip that is beneficial for business will also bring you new friends. Write follow-up letters.

19 other teams. Tomorrow's meet is as big a meet as any other to UMass, although Easterns can seem to be just a prelude to the big New England championships.

"You take your team up and try to win the conference championship, and if you qualify for New Englands in the process, that's fine," said head coach Ken O'Brien.

O'Brien predicts that the University of New Hampshire and Southern Connecticut will battle for the top two spots in the meet, while UMass will try to get 3rd. "We usually finish in the top three or five," said O'Brien.

UMass is looking to Mike Grey and Jeff White in the short sprints and hurdles. Grey has had success this season in the 100 meters, while Jeff White is steadily improving in the 110m hurdles, placing 2nd in the event in a quad meet two weeks ago.

Garfield Vaughn and Steve Brown will run in the 400m for UMass. Both have run around the 48-49 second range the entire season, and will be contenders for 1st place, according to O'Brien.

The end of the spring football season means the release of Jerome Bledsoe onto the track, or rather, the long jump pit. Bledsoe, who has placed 1st and 2nd in two regular season meets in the long jump, has a good shot at taking the title.

Other athletes to look for from UMass will be Jerry Squires in the 5000m, Jon Corso in the 10000m, Reinardo Flores and Steve Tolly in the mile, and Herb Heffner, Fitz Hagan, and Jim McDonald in the steeplechase.

ly, my team is thin in many places, but we do have quality."

Besides DeSantis, several other athletes are looking to score points and the ECACs are still a goal for many. Lee Ann Ambrose and Simone Marisseau, the team's two pillars of consistency, Amy St. Pierre, and Helen Balaouras will most likely be the primary point getters.

Ambrose, the heralded freshman from Gardner, will be seeded according to her indoor time of 56.78 seconds in the 400 meters. Her chances in the quartermile will largely depend on what event BU's Semetra King will enter. She has qualified for the NCAAs in the 400 hurdles and can enter and win any of the four sprint events. In their first encounter, King, a fifth-year senior, defeated Ambrose in the indoor New England championship. In any event, this will not be her last meet, as she has qualified for the ECACs from virtue of that same indoor time.

LaFreniere says Ambrose should place in the top three in the 200. She has been very steady, her slowest time being 25.92 and her fastest time of 25.8 -- on the Smith track in her second meet. Because this event could affect her chances in the 400 (the quartermile finals will be run in between the 200 trials and finals), LaFreniere feels, "Basically, we're aiming at the 400 and anything else is gravy."

Marisseau has been extremely dependable in the shot put, as she has cracked the 40-foot barrier twice. Last weekend at Fitchburg, she managed to please her coaches with her series of throws in the high 38s-low 39s, but she wasn't pleased with herself. LaFreniere said, "She should be right up there with the rest of the field. She does concentrate very well." Marisseau figures to score high as her personal- and season-best of 40'-5' would have placed her second in last year's field. At this meet, she can also qualify for the ECACs, where she is about seven inches short.

St. Pierre won't be running alone in the 10,000, as Kristin Peers and Kathy Holt have also qualified. Peers will almost certainly run faster than her time last week, as she had no warmup time. The plan for the trio will be to run in a pack and try to spur St. Pierre onto victory. "Amy fell off the [six-minute] pace a little bit at Fitchburg but she held on for four miles," said LaFreniere. "If she holds that pace, she'll have a chance of placing."

Like DeSantis, Helen Balaouras will be attending her last New England competition. She will toss the hammer, she placed sixth in the discus last year. Balaouras has thrown a school-record 142'-8' this year, but her absence last week really leaves LaFreniere guessing as to how far she'll throw this weekend. Her teammate, Tina White, has also qualified up to the ECACs and did hold the previous school-record of 131'-1'. Freshman Diane Ozzolek will have an outside chance, according to LaFreniere, of placing in the discus.

In the middle distances, UMass has Sonja Vaughan and Shana Smith in the 800 and 1500, respectively, and they will also make up half of the 2-mile relay. Last year at this same event, Vaughan ran a 2:14 for fourth place, but that was when she was healthy. This year, a hamstring forced her to miss most of the indoor season and an Achilles problem has hampered her outdoors. Last week had to be encouraging, though, as she ran a 2:18 half, her best to date.

About Smith, LaFreniere said, "Shana's been hot and cold all season. It'll be hard to predict where she'll go. Physically, she is capable of placing." LaFreniere says part of her problem is being tense. "She needs to stay relaxed. Sometimes the more she tries, the more she ends up defeating the purpose."

Completing the relay team will be half-milers Michelle Pearlstine and Cathy Crocker. LaFreniere feels that her relay team will have a chance to score, and said of Pearlstine and Crocker, "They'll be fresh. They have to have their best that day."

UMass' only two 400 hurdlers, Sue McFadyen and Amanda Norvell, ran their best times last weekend. Norvell, in particular, broke out of mediocrity with a blazing 68.8 and McFadyen ran a 69.2. "I'd like for them to break 69," said LaFreniere. "But the problem is that to place in New Englands, you need to run a 65."

Finally, LaFreniere said, "We just have to pull together, wait until the smoke clears, and then see where we stand."

Softball sweeps P.C. under the rug

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

The person who created the University of Massachusetts softball team's schedule must have been one of those kids who pulled the legs off insects and shot his dog with a b.b. gun — this person is a masochist.

The Minutewomen played their 16th game in 14 days and, despite the fatigue, won yesterday's double-header in Providence 9-2, 1-0 over the Lady Friars.

Rip Van Winkle was drowsy, and Joan Benoit was 'winded' after the marathon, but the UMass softball team is dead tired. The Minutewomen are battling injuries, the flu, and fatigue, according to UMass coach Elaine Sortino.

"We really need some rest, and we really some good practices. Tell me how we can do both," she said.

Upping its record to 27-15, UMass used some very stong hitting in yesterday's first game, and some equally strong pitching in the second to wipe out the Friars on their own home turf.

The Minutewomen used a six-run explosion in the sixth inning to take their one-run lead into a run away. UMass loaded the bases early in the sixth and, after a Cherie DellAnno single, a Jen Miller double, and a Barbara Meehan smash that sent the center fielder sprawling through the fence, the Friar-later was complete.

With the victory, UMass pitcher Holly Aprile boosted her record to 17-8.

In the second game, UMass was just 'one' better — scoring the lone run with one more hit (UMass had 7 hits, while P.C. clubbed 6).

The lone run was scored in the bottom of the seventh inning by Meehan, after successive hits moved her into scoring position, Aprile singled her home.

The Friars had one last crack at the Minutewomen, Sortino substituted Aprile for Wanner, who had a six-inning shut-out going, hoping the top of the P.C. order would be thrown off balance. The strategy must have worked because Aprile retired the side — giving Wanner her 10th win vs. only seven defeats.

Despite the twin-bill sweep, Sortino wasn't completely satisfied with yesterday's performance.

"We're doing enough to just get by a mediocre team," she said.

Much to Sortino's dismay, the Minutewomen remain on the road this weekend to face Rutgers and St. Josephs. The exhausting weekend stretch represents one-third of UMass' Atlantic 10 schedule.

Baseball looks sky-ward for help against Central Conn.

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Staff

This week has proven that there is a God in Heaven.

The University of Massachusetts baseball team has received help from above during the past few days but not as one might expect. The Minutemen have been in a very heavy slump recently, at last count losing seven-in-a-row and working on getting another long streak of games with at least one error, after having one stretch this season of 21 games containing a blunder.

There haven't been many happy faces in the UMass dugout lately. The Minutemen have lost seven straight but are hoping to change their fortunes this weekend against Providence.

But the good Lord has been kind and not only did He open up the skies to rain out last Tuesday's double-header against a very powerful University of Maine team but he also sent them a blessing undisguised in a cancellation of Saturday's scheduled double-header against Providence College. The Friars backed out of the duel in order to make up a conference match.

Instead, UMass will face only Central Connecticut State University for a late game on Sunday, giving them all day Saturday to lick their wounds and try and get into a state of mind to salvage a few from the end of the season.

The Minutemen have struggled all year losing to teams they shouldn't have and not living up to expectations all around.

The Minutemen have lost to the likes of Dartmouth College, division two power Springfield College and our favorite cross-town rival, the Lord Jeffs of division three (three, for crying out loud!) Amherst College.

■ Gorillas, Syracuse prepare for stadium showdown

For comparison sake, the Gorillas lost to Cornell, 12-11 and beat Rutgers, 13-10. They both have also played Brown, with UMass winning, 15-6 and Syracuse prevailing, 15-4.

The killer has to be the Penn score. The fact that Syracuse was able to absolutely abuse a nationally-ranked team like the Quakers is a true attest to just how good this team is.

And now UMass has to find a way to stop that machine. Most people think it would be good if the Gorillas could keep things respectable, but Garber doesn't think victory is beyond his team.

But there are several things that have to be done. The key to the Penn win for the Orangemen was their ability to win faceoffs and hold the ball. At one point in that game, Syracuse kept the ball away from Penn for a stretch of 17 minutes.

Faceoffs will definitely be a key to tomorrow's clash. The Orangemen have a fair faceoff man in Kirk Pratt, who has successfully drawn on 159 of 244 attempts (.652). Pratt also had a field day with Lou Fusilli, the faceoff specialist from Rutgers who was able to win 23 of 27 draws from UMass opponents last Saturday.

Garber is trying some new things, but it will be essential for Josh Schimmel, Vinny D'Angelo, Tim Soudan or whoever is taking draws against Pratt, to at least win their share, or the game may be over very early.

"We can beat them, but we have to be able to hold the ball," Garber said.

Once the Orange get the ball on offense, they have several different avenues to putting the ball in the cage.

Leading the way is the fraternal duo of Gary and Paul Gait. The two twins hail from Canada, along with freshman Tom Marachek, and all three have a good nose for hitting the twine. It stems from their background of playing box lacrosse in the Great White North, where the goal is only 4 x 4. A standard lax goal is 6 x 6, more than twice the size.

"Their eyes must light up after seeing that 4 x 4 goal," Garber said. "And they all can shoot."

And how. Each possesses an array of shots, including Gary and Paul's knack for leaping over the crease from behind and stuffing the ball under the crossbar while in mid-air. Gary pulled the trick twice in last year's national championship win over Cornell. Don't be surprised if he tries it at least once tomorrow.

Marechek leads the British Columbian trio in points with 52 on 36 goals and 16 assists, followed by Gary (39-11-50) and Paul (27-21-48). But the team leader is senior attack John Zulberti. 'Z', as they call him at 'Cuse, has 23-41-64 numbers this year. He also has over 100 career goals and is second nationally in assists.

On defense the Orange are still good, but they can be scored upon. In net is Matt Palumb, who is allowing 8.0 goals per game with a save percentage of .621.

With the forecast for rain, the fast-paced Orangemen may be slowed down by the wet McGuirk turf. But UMass has no intention of slowing it down, which could lead to an entertaining game no matter who wins.

Gorilla Grumblings: We can't stress this enough — please do not bring oranges to tomorrow's game. You can only hurt UMass by throwing them on the field. Letting the Gorillas run around without having to wear chain mail armor would be a good start. But if you could show up and simply yell your fool heads off and get laryngitis for a good cause, well, that's what sports should be all about.

On the lighter side, if you can't make it to tomorrow's game (which would be a shame), it will be broadcast live by WMUA-91.1 FM, with Mike Fagerson, Randy Krutzler and Tim Ashwell. NESN will also show the game on tape delay at 10 p.m. . . Junior Scott Hiller's first goal tomorrow will be his 100th career . . . Syracuse wears a black patch with a white '103' on it to symbolize the SU students who died in the crash of Flight 103 in Lockerbie, Scotland. "Maybe we should wear a 'BC' on our shirts," Garber joked in reference to Tuesday night's nightmare win.

Track teams ready for Championships this weekend

Women at New Englands

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

For the last three years, Carla DeSantis has performed at an extremely high level of competition. Part of her acheivement as a two-sport athlete at the University has been garnering almost every imaginable award in soccer, the top being named the first team All-American goalie her senior year. In track, she was New England Champion in the javelin as a sophomore and runner-up the other two years. Now as a senior, she will enter her last New England Championship this weekend at Colby College in Waterville, Maine.

This year, however, DeSantis' throws have been down considerably compared to her school record of 158'-8', which she set last year. But she still has qualified for her fourth ECAC, and she is peaking around the right time. DeSantis attributes her slump to being "hesitant and very cautious at the beginning," but in recent weeks, she has been "attacking the javelin a little more than in the beginning."

As for the team, it is also having a down year compared to last year's results, but it is also peaking now, with 13 New England qualifiers. At last year's New Englands, UMass finished second out of 23 schools, but this year, the projection by head coach Julie LaFreniere will be around eighth to tenth.

"This is it for a lot of the girls and this is where we take all of our hard work to," said LaFreniere. "We've been aiming for this since the beginning of the year. Obvious-

Gorillas drop tough contest to Syracuse

UMass unable to overcome six-goal deficit

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

If there can ever be any consolation in losing, this may have been the game.

The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, showing incredible character and will, rallied twice from six-goal deficits and extended arguably the nation's best lax team to the final ticks of the clock before second-ranked Syracuse University came away with a heart-stopping 10-9 win Saturday afternoon at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

As they say, a loss is a loss, no matter how close or how much of a blowout. But the Gorillas (12-2) were predicted by most "in the know" to be routine practice dummies for the high-flying Syracuse machinery. The Orangemen (11-1) had scored 20-plus goals in each of their last three games and were the country's leading offensive force, with 194 goals coming into the game.

Instead, UMass battled its guests tooth and nail until game's end, stunning the Orangemen, thrilling the immense gathering of 12,143, and most likely sending a strong message to the lax world that this team will be heard from before the shouting is over.

"In the rankings it's another loss, but it's nothing to be ashamed of," said UMass coach Dick Garber.

"We needed to prove to ourselves that when we're playing well, we are one of the top teams in the country," said UM senior goalie Sal LoCascio.

And now, Syracuse would have a hard time defeating that case.

But the Gorillas couldn't be satisfied with

Pond concert a success despite muck and mire

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

In spite of the mud, thousands of people swarmed the pond area yesterday to hear Shinehead, The Hooters, Stevie B., and The Tom Tom Club at the Spring Concert.

Some people brought lawn chairs and plastic garbage bags to keep from getting soaked, but several people, including freshman marketing major Denise Hunt, said that they didn't mind the mud.

"Shoes are washable," Hunt said.

Shinehead got the crowd dancing with songs that combined rap and reggae.

"I'm not a big reggae fan," said freshman biochemistry major Neil O'Brien. "But they were fun to listen to."

After a short intermission, the crowd rushed toward the stage to welcome The Hooters, who played for more than an hour.

"So this is UMass and friends," said The Hooters' keyboard player. "Well thanks for having us. This looks like a good day."

They played mostly new material, but finished out their set with their hits "Johnny B," "Satellite," "Day By Day," and "And We Danced."

Due to problems with their bus, Stevie B., a dance band from Hawaii, did not appear onstage for close to an hour after The Hooters.

ost people seemed not to mind, taking the time to play hackey sack, talk with their friends, or stand in line to buy food.

Police said the crowd was very low-key, and they found no instances of people trying to bring in drugs or alcohol.

At about 5 p.m., Stevie B. ran onstage and shouted, "This will be the most partying 30 minutes you've ever seen."

Michele Smith, a junior human services major, said the group's dance routines "got everybody in the crowd involved."

The crowd began to clear out after Stevie B., but about half stayed to hear The Tom Tom Club, a group consisting of former Talking Heads members.

"What about those B-Boys. Pretty studly, huh?" said the lead singer, taking a moment between songs to poke fun at the group.

"[The Tom Tom Club] was pretty good," said Dave Madson, a senior economics major. "But they were fairly redundant."

Several people, including Justine Fiore, a sophomore legal studies major, said "it turned out to be a good day."

"You didn't need to know the bands to have a good time," Fiore said.

19 protesters suspended from University

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Nineteen University of Massachusetts students were suspended from the University Thursday after being arrested following the occupation of an office in the Graduate Research Center.

Jo-Anne Thomas Vanin, dean of students, told the UMass student protesters Thursday morning that if they did not leave the office they would be arrested, immediately suspended from the University and fined by the bursar's office.

The fine will be assessed to compensate for the cost of the arrests and mobilizing the outside police forces, according to Jeanne Hopkins, University spokeswoman.

The arrests in the Memorial Hall occupation cost the University over $25,000, said Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs. The demonstrators will also be fined for the use of the office's facsimile, xerox and coffee machines. The fees have not yet been determined.

Thirty-five people were arrested Thursday after a 22-hour takeover of the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Research and Graduate students. The occupation was the third in as many weeks in protest of military-funded research at UMass. There have been 103 arrests in the takeovers.

Student leaders were irate with the administration's decision to suspend the students without a hearing. Eric Nakajima, student trustee, John Dunlap, senate speaker, and Tracy Davis, student government association president, were inside the office as impartial observers from Wednesday afternoon to Thursday morning.

They left when they were told by members of the administration that the protesters would be suspended from the University by the implementation of an interim sanction. This permits the administration to suspend students without a hearing if there is a clear and present danger to the University. A hearing follows the suspension so the students can apply for reinstatement.

"The interim sanction clause was negotiated last summer. Examples of clear and present danger are arsonists who are caught throwing a lighted match into a bucket full of paper," Davis said.

"We left because they [the protesters] were denied due process, they [the administration] are stretching out the clear and present danger rule to cover themselves," Davis said. "If they aren't reinstated, second semester seniors may not graduate, and they face the threat of expulsion."

The students who were suspended were given 24 hours to schedule a hearing with the dean of students office. The hearing is the first step toward reinstatement.

"It isn't as if we dropped due process," said Hopkins. "The administration has the option when there is a violation of the picketing code to declare an interim sanction."

She said the dean of students office would start the hearing process immediately.

"The administration clearly violated our rights, there was no due process," said Frank Bowrys, a UMass student who was arrested and consequently suspended. "The administration used us as a scare tactic to stop our movement from growing."

Twelve Hampshire College students were arrested Thursday following the takeover. The Hampshire students were informed by Trey Williams, dean of students at Hampshire, that they were banned from taking classes at UMass.

Protester conduct ires secretaries

Secretaries who work in the Graduate Research Center office taken over Wednesday are irate with the behavior and lack of respect the protesters displayed during the "peaceful" sit-in.

"You hear so much about the students' side of the story, it's about time someone listened to the clerical staff's side," Martha Martin, a secretary in the Office of the Vice Chancellor of Research and Graduate students said.

"125 students came storming into the office, they might as well have considered us pieces of furniture," Martin said. "They totally disregarded the employees in the office and had total disrespect for everything in the office."

The clerical staff in the office said it spent hours cleaning up coffee stains on the file cabinets and reorganizing papers on their desks that the demonstrators shuffled through.

Barbara Krawczyk listed the items missing or damaged in the office as a result of the sit-in. Coffee, doughnuts, hot chocolate, sugar, paper and a sweater were among the articles missing.

"They insisted it was a peaceful protest, but they came in screaming, moving the furniture around, jumping on our desks," Jeane Powers, a secretary, said. "That's not what I call a peaceful protest. There wasn't peace in their eyes."

Gay rights supporters march to show pride

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Despite a rainy start, nearly 1,500 people celebrated the eighth annual Lesbian Gay Bisexual Pride March on Saturday. The streets were lined with spectators while approximately 30 groups and organizations marched through town beneath a large rainbow arch of balloons.

Many marchers carried signs with slogans like, "Freedom," "Homophobia is Uncool," and "Gay Teachers Nurture Self-Esteem."

A group called the Peacekeepers marched alongside the marchers to assure them that there would be no physical harassment during the parade.

Lisa Johnson, member of the recently formed UMass Lesbian Bi-sexual Womyn's Union, said, "We want to tell the community that we're here, to go out and be proud of being gay. It's good to get together and march as a sign of unity. Despite all threatening letters and phone calls, we still exist."

Joanne Gray of the UMass NOW Chapter brought a contingent of about 20 UMass members. "[Gay rights] is an important part of feminism. There's no way to be a feminist and not support gay rights," Gray said.

Pat Griffen of the UMass Faculty support group said, "It's a wonderful day. Everyone gets support for who they are. There's a tendency to think that there aren't any lesbians or gays in this community."

She continued to say that the group supports the Gay Rights Bill that is in the State House. "It's way past time we had civil rights."

Jennifer Kates, a UMass teaching assistant, marched with Daglow, a Dartmouth community support group. "It's important for people to see their own community. Gays and lesbians have a real presence here," she said.

Many heterosexuals also showed support and marched in the parade, calling themselves allies. Hope Moore, a UMass ally, said, "These people should have the freedom to love who they want to love. They are are very courageous and brave."

A handful of people protesting the parade gathered outside of City Hall, among them were members of the Faith Baptist Church from Florence. They held up signs saying, "Sodomy is a sin against God" and "Woman was created for man."

The half-hour parade ended in Pulaski Park where the marchers celebrated the success of the "Pride and Rights" march with a concert and rally.

Amherst book sale offers inexpensive novel cache

By NANCY KLINGENER

Dealing is pretty serious business. And we're not talking cocaine or marijuana here. We're talking books.

The annual Amherst League of Women Voters book sale, held this weekend on the Common, attracted students, faculty and the rest of the reading public, who realize they could get incredible buys.

But at 8:30 a.m. Friday, before the sale opened, the professional dealers were ready, with boxes and an eye for the saleable.

"The dealers know that we have some wonderful bargains," said Carol Gehlbach, co-chair of the sale.

A line of about 75 people formed Friday morning, Gehlbach estimated, waiting for first crack at the books — 1,000 cartons of them.

The Amherst sale, in its 39th year, is well-known because "people are getting rid of good books" here, Gehlbach said.

The dealers rushed in when the sale started promptly at 9 a.m., eagerly looking for the titles and editions they want. About 15 tables stood loaded with every kind of book, from romance novels to mathematics texts.

In the Saturday morning storm, a tent flap blew open and some books were soaked. The sale would probably have been called because of the weather in any town but Amherst, Gehlbach said.

"It's a wonderful community basically because people love books here," she said.

By Saturday, the book dealers had cleared out and the tent was less crowded, with the casual readers and families checking the tables.

Emily Todd, an Amherst College student browsing the history section, said she has attended the sale for four years.

"I think they're amazingly cheap, and it's a really good section," she said. "There's always something that pops up."

Higher awareness transcends physical surroundings

Prof: More to the world than meets the touch

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

There is more to life than what is attainable in the material world, Microbiology Professor Albey Reiner told about 500 listeners in the Campus Center Auditorium Thursday night.

In the lecture sponsored by the Alpha Lambda Delta freshman honor society at the University of Massachusetts, Reiner spoke of gaining a higher sense of awareness through a union with the non-material world that transcends one's physical surroundings.

"This lecture is swimology," Reiner said. "We are the material world, that's a given. We have bodies and material laws [of nature], but it doesn't have to be that way. In my life experience the material intersects constantly with the non-material world. That's the swimology — how to swim back and forth" between the two worlds.

Often times, an intersection is created by outside forces such as a near-death experience, drugs, spiritual teachers or a particularly stressful situation where the person involved suddenly feels different, he said.

Reiner told the story of a pitcher trying out for the major leagues. When the young man started throwing, a game of catch started up among the other players and a group of scouts sat down behind home plate to watch.

The pressure was tremendous, but as the prospect began throwing fast balls, the sound of the ball hitting the catcher's mitt boomed around the stadium, Reiner said.

Those playing catch stopped, watching in amazement but the young man was so intensely involved in throwing he didn't notice, Reiner said.

Reading from the young man's account of what happened, Reiner said "It was as if I too was standing outside myself and watching myself throw. Nothing mattered but watching myself throw."

The scouts were so impressed they signed him on to their triple-A farm team but, unfortunately for the player, he was never able to repeat the performance, Reiner said.

The moral of the story, said Reiner, was the young man's inability to understand what had happened, and therefore "he didn't know how to do it again."

"You're offered a way to experience things and make the most of it," he said. "This isn't about getting high once in a while — it's about being high."

He told of his own experience as an undergraduate at Princeton University when he saw "this blue thing hanging in the sky — it was a frisbee."

Although a common sight in the 1980s, the event was particularly relevant to Reiner because there were few frisbees around in the 1950s. What keeps the experience fresh is Reiner's level of awareness, he said.

"If there's no past then that frisbee is just as beautiful. The thing that changes it is. . .oh well, there's a frisbee,'" he said.

"The moment is not in time and it provides the intersection between these two worlds. You are on the edge and you get to see a frisbee every day. If you make it a priority you can live on the edge. Life is not interstate 80 going through Kansas," he said.

Older undergrads find knowledge desire keener

By MICHELLE MELLMAN

Seventh in a 10-part series on life at the University of Massachusetts

For many students, the first day of school can be exciting, but for the majority of older undergraduate students at the University of Massachusetts, it may be frightening.

Going to college directly after high school may be impossible. Or, maybe beginning college is possible but finishing it is not. But deciding to go back to college 10 or 20 years after high school requires courage and determination, students said.

For Kim Lambert, a 33-year-old senior with a concentration in human services, college has been an on-going process since she graduated from high school in 1975.

Working in a factory after graduation, Lambert said she earned her associate degree at Middlesex Community College. She said she then transferred to UMass to study plant and soil science.

"It didn't take long to realize that plant and soil science just wasn't for me," Lambert said. "I left school for a while. I just needed some space. I had very unrealistic ideas about what I wanted to study and how to narrow my interest."

After working for some time, Lambert resumed night classes at UMass part-time, a long but necessary process due to financial difficulties, she said.

Lambert who began night classes as an older student, said she was surprised by the overall attitude of the younger students toward learning.

"In the night classes I took there were a lot more students my age and there was a great deal of dialogue, a lot of questions were asked, and just a high level of interest in the material being taught," Lambert said. "I was shocked when I sat in my morning and afternoon classes last semester. I was very excited to start school and I thought the subjects were really interesting. But my younger classmates seemed really bored. They didn't have much to say."

"I once had a professor who played a very authoritative role in the classroom and he completely turned people off," she said. I've never had a hard time speaking up but for some people it's more difficult. The classroom is a perfect place for students to practice speaking their minds."

Lambert, who is researching graduate school, said she would like to continue working in the human service sector after graduation.

"I'd like to work with the elderly, somewhere I could practice social policy," said Lambert, who hopes to graduate this month.

Not knowing exactly where one's interests lie may be a reason a student does not earn a degree in the standard four-year period, some students said. But for 46-year-old Bonnie Fritz, marriage took precedence.

Fritz, who attended New York University after high school, finished three semesters, but then married and started a family.

"I always had the idea of going back to school in the back of my head but the time just wasn't right," she said.

Now, after 20 years, Fritz plans to finish her college career with a University Without Walls degree, with a concentration in Native American culture.

"It was a big decision because I knew how much time it would involve," she said. "I knew it would be difficult on my family also. They would just have to understand why all of a sudden I had to spend so much time away from them."

Fritz said the greatest obstacle to overcome in getting back into the college scene was the age difference and the perception of her professors toward her as an older student. She said the participation levels among the younger students was somewhat lower than of older students.

"I think some younger students are not quite sure how to relate to an older student," Fritz said. "I try not to talk too much in class because I do not want to seem intimidating to anyone. I feel [younger students] look for the older person to be the spokesperson. I don't want to be that. I want them to get as much out of the class as I do."

According to Fritz, it can be just as intimidating for the older student when you are only one in a class of 50.

Fritz feels having the extra years of life's experiences works to her advantage in the classroom.

"I feel that they [professors] generally tend to like having older students in their classes because people who return to school after so many years appreciates education so much," she said. "We know that if we don't do it now we may never get such an opportunity again."

In the future Fritz said she hopes to work in a job where she may apply the skills she acquired while in college. She said she also hopes to do some writing on the side. Fritz plans to graduate next May alongside her eldest daughter, an interior design major.

Sharon White, a 34-year-old senior, was forced to put her college career on hold when her mother's emotional state required most of Sharon's time.

"I went to school for two years in Vermont after high school," White said. "But because I was from a dysfunctional family my concentration level and self esteem were very low. I was at school physically, but that was about it."

After leaving school, White received a job as a health inspector in Haverhill and stayed on for eight years until she decided it was time to finish her education.

"I often said to myself during those eight years, if I could stop time, the one thing I would love to do is finish my college career," she said.

"The hardest thing about going back to school was giving up my support system, my friends, my family, and my past," White said. "I also found it very difficult to get back into writing term papers again."

White, unlike Lambert and Fritz, does not feel the levels of interest differ between the older and younger students at UMass.

"I can't generalize," said White. "There's been classes where I've been 12 years older than most of the students and they have made me feel ageless. Most students have impressed me with what they have to say. I've learned a lot from them."

However, she said she feels she has an extra edge over younger students when it comes to life's experiences.

"I think being an older student is an extremely rewarding advantage, being able to take your experiences and knowledge of the outside world into the classroom," she said. "Professors seem to enjoy this."

White said she is proud of her accomplishments. "I can't tell you how happy I will be on the 28th of May. I've done very well here. My self esteem is so much higher than when I started here," she said, adding that she plans to graduate in May with a University Without Walls degree, with a concentration in family and community intervention.

White said her ultimate goal involves working with dysfunctional and abused children, tying in with the metaphysical and astrological aspects of the home and family.

Although they all have different interest and goals, Lambert, Fritz, White and other older UMass undergraduates said they hold a common bond in the true desire to better themselves.

"I came full circle from the life I was leading and it will be rewarded with a college degree," White said.

The American Manual Alphabet

Drawings show a side view. In actual practice the letters should face the persons with whom you are communicating.

Printed with permission of Gospel Publishing House, Springfield, Missouri. From The Joy of Signing By Lottie L. Riekehof. 5-5-89 & 5-8-89

FYI

DASL will be acknowledged on May 8, 1989. DASL (pronounced dazzle) stands for Day of American Sign Language. On that day students, faculty, and staff will be asked to practice sign language or finger spelling as part of the regular communication process. A table will be set up in the Cmapus Center Concourse with information about "signing". Prior to DASL, beginning April 24, 1989, signs and finger spelling will appear in the Collegian for people to practice. On May 5, 1989 and May 8, 1989 the entire American Manual Alphabet will be published. A public meeting to discuss various aspects of ASL relevant to the University will be held on May 9th in CC Room 811B-15 from 7-9 p.m.

DASL follows other events on campus to increase the campus community's awareness about this form of language and the need to offer sign language courses on a regular basis. DASL is also part of an attempt to highlight the fact that May is Better Hearing and Speech month. This event is being sponsored by the Communications Disorders Club, the Committee to Institute American Sign Language, and the Department of Communication Disorders. Anyone interested in participating on the committee should contact Sandra Lindberg at 5-0131.

Reiner's lecture

In a question-and-answer session after the lecture, Reiner clarified his position on the use of drugs to attain awareness saying alcohol is "the opposite of awareness. Drugs are more complicated. They give you a view, then you come down [and] it takes away your long term ability to be there."

One of the more popular ways to access the non-material world is through repetetive acts such as chanting or meditation, but there is no formula to achieve a connection, Reiner said.

"For any of these experiences whether it's taking drugs or going to a great spiritual teacher or a near-death experience there is a group that gets it and a group that doesn't. If there is a formula, people would be following it," he said.

Reiner's own experience with the non-material world started about 20 years ago and has only grown stronger with passing time and the help of a spiritual teacher who "without words. . .taught me to access [the non-material world]. He just made me very familiar with it," he said.

Even though his awareness of the non-material world is high, Reiner does not believe there is anything wrong with the material world except that people need to look for life's deeper relationships and not BMWs, he said.

"I have no problem with the material world. It's just that science's experimentations are limited to the material world. I'm quite comfortable experimenting with things that can't be explained by science, he said.

"Even though science is closed-minded to much of this stuff, I feel I approach it as the scientist I have always been — I observe and try to understand," he said.

State rep opposes toxin usage

State Representative Stan Rosenberg joined representatives from the University of Massachusetts chapter of MassPIRG Saturday in support of a state bill that would reduce the number and volume of toxic chemicals used in industry and research.

Rosenberg (D-Amherst) said although 130 legislators are listed as co-sponsors of House bill 1929, "they have only agreed with the principle of the concept; the specifics have yet to be worked out."

He said this is because of the "serious and rather costly changes needed [by industries] to abide with the bill."

Aaron Rome, co-chairperson of the UMass chapter of MassPIRG, said of the four steps developed to eradicate toxic materials — stopping illegal dumping, cleaning contaminated sites, preventing contamination and making reparations to victims — only the first has had much success.

"Although a 1986 referendum question showed overwhelming support for the clean-up of the worst sites, the continued production and use of these materials makes cleaning up a temporary step," he said. "What we need is prevention, and prevention is the purpose [of the bill]."

Rosenberg commended MassPIRG's efforts, but said their efforts would not speed up the bill's passing. The bill is in committee hearings, Rosenberg said, adding that he could not speculate on a timetable for the bill becoming law.

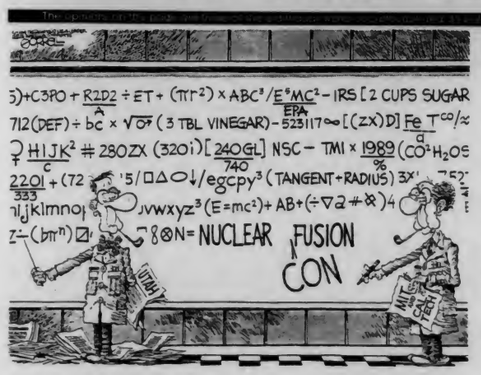
EDITORIAL/OPINION



Harsh facts about anthrax

As a former soldier in the US Army Intelligence Corps, current graduate student and teaching assistant at the University of Massachusetts, I have been disappointed by the reference by UMass administrators, faculty, and grad students to the anthrax research as either "benign" or "peaceful"

David Holper

During the public hearing before the Amherst Board of Health on April 27, one graduate student (who is working with Dr. Thorne on his anthrax research) even went so far as to state that anthrax had been considered as a potential biological weapon several years ago but had been dropped because of the difficulty researchers found in obtaining lethal concentrations of spores, or finding toxic enough strains.

Both of these points are nonsense.

An anthrax bomb was tested in the early 1940's on the island of Gruinard. This test left the island uninhabitable. According to the Department of Defense's 1987 book entitled "Soviet Military Power" (from which the following material is mostly quoted or rephrased to include as much relevant material as possible). In 1979 there was an accidental release of anthrax within the Microbiology and Virology Institute (a military facility) in Sverdlovsk City that "caused many casualties and most likely a very high death rate among Soviet citizens who were exposed." U.S. intelligence sources noted the following:

As much as 10 kilograms of dry anthrax spores were released from the Institute and contaminated an area with a radius of at least three to five kilometers. Within two weeks (the expected time for the disease to develope) a significant number of deaths occurred. Residents and workers within the contaminated area contracted pulmonary anthrax through inhalation, skin contact, or possibly from ingesting contaminated food (caused by the fallout of spores). Initial disinfection and decontamination procedures were largely ineffective.

The heavy military involvement following the incident, along with early military casualties, total military control within two weeks, plus rooftop spraying of decontaminating solutions from aircraft, were in no way consistent with the public health control measures necessary for dealing with anthrax acquired by eating bad meat, as the Soviets claimed.

The reported aerial spraying activity and disinfection with steam and hypochlorite solution around the military facility were clearly intended to decontaminate surfaces affected by an infectious aerosol.

The DOD authors also point out that anthrax can be dispersed in either a liquid or dry form. It is a non-contagious agent, and can be killed with strong disinfectants or high temperature.

"The number of anthrax spores required to kill 50 percent of exposed individuals (lethal dose 50 or LD50) is between 8,000 to 10,000. Even though such high concentrations of anthrax are required to be delivered over a target population, the Soviets have no technical difficulties in achieving this."

Anthrax research may appear to be a benign cause which the UMass researchers and administrators feel will only be used to assist Third World nations with combating anthrax in domestic animals, but the reality is that it's not. Both the Soviet and the American defense establishments covertly or overtly acknowledge anthrax as a weapon.

Although Dr. Thorne may feel anthrax "does not support biological warfare in terms of offensive biological warfare," he seems unaware that a biological agent is almost of no use on a tactical battlefield without a vaccine.

The DOD is paying both faculty and student sat UMass to develop a vaccine that will make anthrax useful on a nuclear/biological/chemical battlefield. To think less is to deceive yourself into a lie that is spiritually as toxic as anthrax itself.

Some peaceful research ambitious

I have a problem.
I'm an engineer.
I wish to design hydro, solar, and wind energy sources for rural regions.
I'm an engineer. I wish to develop high strength building materials and synthesize new drugs.
I'm an engineer.
I wish to design advanced radar systems to make the skies safer.
I'm an engineer.
I wish to design alternative waste reduction and recycle programs.
I'm an engineer.
I wish to obtain funds for my research from a university plagued by budget cuts. My "peaceful" research ambitions have military applications or are spin-offs from military technology.

Would you force the Wright brothers to abandon their dreams of flight at the prospect of defense applications?

One-third of all grants, including Department of Defense grants, fund the entire university. These grants are used to pay faculty and TA's, install new buildings and facilities, cap tuition, and increase available class sections. Elimination of any of these funds poses grave consequences to my research and the survival of a budget crunched university. DOD grants are for general, unclassified education. Protesting DOD grants is attacking the best application of military spending-education.

Who has the problem?

I encourage the People for a Socially Responsible University to examine the research undertaken, weigh its social and militaristic applications, and then act responsibly. Awareness is a two-way street.

Making life easy for wimps

"Please get the help you need."

"You'll never know how much I love you."

"I wonder if you know how happy you've made me."

Sounds like an open, real-live mature conversation between bold, outgoing humans. Fooled you, didn't it?

It's really a peek at the headlines of Hallmark's new line of greeting cards, "Between You and Me" Honest Words, Real Feelings — Cards that are SO genuine, they sound like humans talking. They eradicate that everyday burden of saying how you feel and what's on your mind.

People without spines, take heart. The cards really work if you are too shy to say nearly anything about absolutely everything to anyone. If you haven't seen them yet in card stores, you may have trouble believing their existence. So, here is Holly and Mark's story. They were fortunate enough to win Hallmark's promotional contest that awarded them a lifetime's supply of "Honest Words, and Real Feelings."

Their correspondence began when they met in line at Sackett's when Mark finished paying for his Big Bird to complete his Sesame Street miniature figurine collection. In his haste to open his mouth and speak, he left behind some of his "Real Feelings." Holly read one, forgetting that the card said "Hallmark"not "Holly." It was definitely star-crossed love, but neither knew what to do, until Mark sent his first card, My Love is Waiting Just for You.

HOLLY (opening a decorative card), reads: There is Something You Ought To Know. (inside) I wish I could tell you in person, but I don't know how. I never knew how to love until I met you. You came and opened my heart, showed me the colors of rainbows, the flight of a bluejay in winter. Thank you, my sweet pilot.

MARK (removing trifocals), reads: I'm Not Sure I Should Tell You This. (inside) I just want to be your everything. I never knew love before I accidentally met you. You glided into my life like a gilded swan via some predestined fate. Now I'm forever yours, my innocent one!

HOLLY, (peeling skin of a pomegranite) reads: I Hope I'm Not Being Precocious. (inside) But I feel we're at a point in our relationship where I can trust you, sweetest. So, I need to know of all your past relationships. It's not that I don't trust you! Oh, no! I feel the knowledge would bring us as close as two petals of a rose. Let's talk, love.

MARK (choking on tofu): I'm Not Sure How To Broach This Topic, It Is So Personal. (inside) You see, my flighty swan, you need help. And I'm not qualified to give it to you. I'm not a professional, not trained to help you, my honey. Please get to a psychiatrist.

HOLLY (pacing to and fro in her flat), reads: We Need To Talk Again, It Has Enlightened Me So To Your Ways. (inside): Let's find each other once again, and forget all that's happened in the past. Call me very soon.

MARK (who notices the cards are becoming shorter and shorter) reads: Saying Goodbye Is Never Easy. (inside) You've been wonderful, always there to talk to whenever I needed you. So verbal. So convincing. But the time has come for us to fly our own separate ways, to spread our wings.

Fall, 1994: After a five-year air-mail relationship, post office engineers stumble on the idea of laser stamps, and the entire mailing system goes awry.

Spring, 1994: Holly and Mark break up. So does Hallmark.

Ignoring the chance for dialogue

We feel compelled to express our outrage at the events that surrounded the takeover of the Graduate Research Center on May 3 and 4. We agreed to assist as observers to ensure the safety of everyone involved. We worked in good faith with the students, police and administration throughout the night to make the situation a little more bearable. At one point during the night, it became clear that we had ceased to receive any significant information regarding the options under consideration by the administration. As observers, we didn't expect any formal role in decision making, however, the lack of communication was alarming.

As elected student leaders, our job is to bridge the gap between students and the administration. On the morning of May 4, we found that task to be impossible. The decision to impose interim suspension upon the protesting students is outrageous, but even more so given the lack of contact with our group.

The interim suspension clause of the Code of Student Conduct was abused by the administration. Negotiations with the Division of Student Affairs last summer led us to understand that this disciplinary sanction would only be adopted in circumstances involving imminent danger. Imminent danger had been understood by all to involve situations arson or students wielding guns. It was certainly never implied that a non-violent occupation of an office would qualify. In fact, it was implied that student protests couldn't constitute imminent danger.

This occupation didn't present a threat to any University property or to individual safety. The protesters were courteous, and indeed requested garbage bags and a vacuum cleaner to neaten the office. The students inside the office prevented a volatile situation by requesting their supporters outside to stop pounding on the GRC windows.

While we may not support the particular demands of the protestors, we strongly advocate the immediate lifting of the students' suspensions. The quality of dialogue on this campus doesn't match the tenor of our times. The administration still has the opportunity to challenge the student protestors to participate in a responsible forum for the discussion of Department of Defense research. Such debate is consistent with the highest ideals of a public university, and charts a realistic course for the resolution of funding issues on this campus. We don't ask miracles of ourselves or others, we merely wish the sincere satisfaction of our common desire for a community founded by law and bound by mutual respect. This, surely, isn't beyond our reach.

Protest hurts students

We, as students in technical majors, are outraged by the recent occupation of the Lederle Graduate Research Center. These protesters, many of whom do not even attend this University, have cut off hundreds of students from the resources that we need to complete our studies. While some of us support their right to protest against something that they don't believe in, we don't support their actions.

The Physical Sciences library, a library which may technical majors use, has been closed because of the protesters. The students who use this, mainly Engineering, COINS, Chemistry, and other technical majors, use it for the resources available and for its location close to many of our classes. By denying us access to it, they are abusing our rights. Many of our professors are unable to prepare for their lectures or hold office hours because they are unable to get to their offices. Many students who work in the LGRC, not all of which are involved with military research, are unable to go to work. The protesters have affected the lives of fellow students more than the administration and should thing again about what they are doing.

WESTWOOD — Dominic Marinelli of Walpole, president of the 92-year-old Norfolk Golf Club on East Street, vowed yesterday to rebuild the clubhouse that was destroyed in a $100,000, three-alarm fire over the weekend.

Marinelli said the golf course will reopen in a couple of days and the clubhouse will be rebuilt. "It's a disappointment," he said. "The building has been there a lot of years and there's a lot of history to it. But we'll come out of it. The club will survive like it has in the past."

No members were in the clubhouse during the fire which started near the club's function room at 5 a.m. yesterday, leaving only the shop and a section of the locker room standing, John J. Sheehy said.

Cap fits Shinehead at the pond

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Staff

Shinehead/The Hooters/Stevie B./The Tom Tom Club
Campus Pond
May 7

I get my wakeup call earlier than usual this morning, seeping imperceptibly into the crevices of my brain, the terrible thud of a snaredrum banging incessantly, echoing between buildings, and then a song which seems to waft more out of memory than the cool gusts which are blowing my papers all over the room. My faculties reluctantly drag themselves from the soft folds of sleep and I recognize it as "Genius of Love.' Conclusion: the Tom Tom Club are soundchecking for this year's spring concert. Perhaps I should go see them now before the herd arrives. That's the last thought in my head before I drift off to sleep again.

Spring Concert is carefully (or badly, depending on your point of view) planned. Like New York Stories, it sandwiches the crap in between the two respectable acts. If The Hooters would get their clumsy, vacuous stadiadross out of the way first, then I could get at least another hour's sleep, and would it be asking too much if Stevie B. followed them, whining like an overheated hairdryer, merchandising dance-dreck faster than the enlightened ear would care to follow. Then perhaps I could enjoy a leisurely lunch as well. But it's not to be. The opening act is Shinehead. He goes on at 1 p.m. sharp and, as usual, I'm late.

As I had previously suspected, thing are pretty quiet down by the Nuremberg-like FAC wall for Shinehead's set. His band are tighter than the spandex on the legs of the girl in front of me. There's no "Boops", but everything else about the show is well up to par, from the slow-fuse of "If the Cap Fits" to a rousing "Don't give me no Crack." There's also an interesting cover of the underrated Junior's "Mama Used to Say," slowed down to a skankin' swagger, which kind of misses the point of the original's hyperactive groove. "Mama used to say, don't you rush to get old" Shinehead sings in his inimitable cool tones. You needn't worry about that pal - most of this crowd left the larger part of their minds back in junior high.

Predictably the rest of the New York raggamuffin's message, stuff about racial inequality, ghettoization etc. is lost on the waves of muscle-brained prat-boys, who're too into their bodies to care. I have a momentary vision of a mushroom cloud rising over fraternity row, but it's just wishful thinking.

Shinehead's set ends too quickly, and, with this crowd, raising an encore is like raising the dead.

As I wander back to Campus Center, the herd begin to descend in droves from Southwest for the Hooters. This is the kind of stuff America was built on, the stuff that, if you look at it too hard and pose the question "What are you made of, mate?" will crumble away into dust like the California coastline, sinking into deep blue oceans of ignominity.

I could almost take it if I'd had a good few double vodkas to think about, but at the gates they're checking people's towels, no doubt to see if the fiends have saturated them in Michelob, something to suck on when things start to suck.

Which is about exactly the moment that Stevie B. steps on stage, looking like a Strawberry Daquiri, and sounding like the result of an immaculate conception between Paula Abdul and Taylor Dayne. "Party, oh party" he sings, inviting an all too willing crowd to come join him in drum-machine nirvana. I must admit, I'm amazed by his astonishing range, both musically and lyrically. Cries of "Party over here" accompanied by a duh-duh-ti-pow rhythm, are juxtaposed with "Get up on this!" to an infectious duh-ti-pow-pause-duh-duh-ti-pow beat. The crowd go wild. At the end Stevie B. reveals that he "loves the hell" out of us guys, and suddenly my life has meaning. Bobby McFerrin was right. "Don't worry, throw up!"

After the vision in dayglo pink has left the stage, the crowd rapidly begins depleting. It seems that the Tom Tom Club are just too "alternative" for most, including the sun, who decides to call it a day with the tinky-bop Casio riffs still bouncing in his head. Soon enough the haircuts of Hampshire College students begin popping up in the throng like unusual trees.

When they finally take the stage, its obvious that Chris and Tina are out to piss off the animal rights activists. The entire band is clad in black leather, except Tina who is clad in brown leather. Their first number sounds like Voice of the Beehive, and my expectations, like my feet, begin to sink slowly into the mud.

They recover momentarily with "Genius of Love", a funky trip in anyone's book. But Chris's rappin' is growing increasingly ridiculous as the years go on. "Don't believe the hype!" he yells at one point, for no apparent reason other than to say "Hey look everybody, I'm cool. I listen to Public Enemy." Every time he laughs and utters something inane like "Hey, let's rock this out" he reminds me more and more of the "fat-old-geezer-in-the-disco" syndrome.

Much of the Tom Tom Club's new stuff sounds like the Heads circa Speaking in Tongues, i.e. they have failed to learn the lesson that if you stay in the same gear all the time, you'll "use it up and wear it out." Of course there is the trendy house turn of "Call of the Wild" and some stuff that sounds vaguely Eno-esque, but in general you'd be pretty much ideologically correct if, like the people I was with, you left after "Genius of Love."

They're still playing as I walk away from the debris. Grey realty sets in like quick-dry cement. It's like the aftermath of some huge party that was dead before it even got off the ground. And that, to modify the words of Jonah Lewie 'is why you'll always find me in the bathroom at parties."

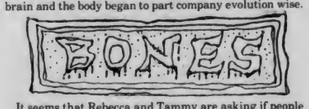
Brain has it over bone in the mind of Yeasthead

By JASON TALERMAN
Collegian Staff

Thank that ole bastid above that I had the presence of mind to change the format of the Bones. Otherwise I'd be doing irreversable damage to my self image by trying to find a thousand different ways to say how incredibly bad the Pond concert was this year. Yes, once again, that ridiculously convoluted organization known as UPC has wasted valuable tax dollars by hiring useless one hit has beens to send synth drums cascading all over the valley. There was a lot of flooding this weekend. As sound travels far over water, there are inpatients at the nursing homes for ten miles mistaking that crap echo bass drum sound for defribulator trouble. D.O.D. nuthin, UPC spends enough money outfitting their friends with tee shirts to put the entire town of Roxbury through college, including computer fees. But now to the matter at hand,

There are two kinds of people: one lives life, the other is considering life, while at the same time inadvertently living it. Which would you say, Talerman, is living life more fully? — Rebecca and Tammy, Northampton.

I'm a big fan of the brain. We don't understand a thing about it, it has the same general appearance as tripe, and it's grey but yet it is the one thing that has caused us to excel, and, at the same time, drive us to the brink of certain doom. you'd have to go back to Lyndon Johnson to find living tissue that could claim the same characteristics. I mean in the five million or so years that man has been scuttling about physicality has determined the main hunk of evolution. But about 10,000 years ago, or .1/of said time, things began to take a change. People began to use the brain to ease the pain of evolution and to create shortcuts where simple brute strength did not have the savvy to lead us. This is about where the brain and the body began to part company evolution wise.



It seems that Rebecca and Tammy are asking if people should live life in the "devil may care" mold or if they should spend time analyzing life at every turn. They seem to be implying that the problem with the latter is that if you spend your time dwelling on the questions of life then you might let some of it whizz by you. This is a valid point, one much debated in the folk scare of the late 50's and early 60's, but in my mind it is also a good lot of horse shit. I'm not lobbying to be overcautious but the mind is so goddamn fast and powerful that we always have time for a thought or two before we act. To prove my point, let us consider a scenario. A high scool dropout, not too much of a thinker anyway, begins to experiment with PCP to pass the time at the shoe insole factory. Dust is notorious for sending incredible vibes of spontaneity through a person. So this young man neglects to eat breakfast and takes a bigger dose than usual. On an empty stomach his body becomes totally gripped by the drug. Without a care in the world he leaps head first into the mammoth gearing of the 72 inch press, end of story.

Evolution of the mind is parabolic in nature. Physical Darwinian growth grinds on and on but the brain has expanded its scope so hard and fast that we can hardly keep up. Christ, I didn't even have a VCR in high school and now I don't even have sex anymore because I can rent the likes of Blood Simple (sorry Em, I forgot about this one) every night and get the same approximate sensation. There's something about murder when in the hands of a quality filmaker that just gives me that awful feeling in the loins. I dunno though, maybe It's that old hernia coming back to haunt me.

Thanx for all the submissions. Keep them coming. Though there's only a week left it is possible that I may be able to sell my soul to some ridiculous arts and entertainment rag in exchange for a few lines a week and enough change to buy those dried out husks of dough that we all know as Stop and Shop english muffins.

I do have enough space left this week to touch base on one more question. Steve, from Southwest wants me to tell him who is better, the Beatles or the Stones. Well, it's exactly this type of question that I would expect from somebody who signs their letters in such an amorphous light. Steve, you should definitely use up those 10 free counseling appointments that Health Services provides for all students because you definitely have a problem. I went to the lacrosse game on Saturday and saw about 2000 guys just like you. Incidently, the Stones kick mighty ass on the Beatles. J. Talerman, 113 Campus Center, UMass, Amherst, Ma, 01003.

The brilliance of a true believer at Smith College

By GRAEME THOMSON

Nanci Griffith
John M. Greene Hall
May 4.

I wasn't expecting this, stepping off a particularly harrowing ride on the PVTA in Northampton, only to be confronted by a line of people the length of which I haven't seen since Star Wars opened in my hometown. I waited in line along with the weatherbeaten faces of what seemed like thousands of No-Ho-pers. The sight of so many bearded men and women in flannel shirts discussing house prices in Western Mass was depressing to behold, but I was cheered by the thought of witnessing, for the second time in two years, the genius of Nanci Griffith.

But of course, first of all I had to sit through the support act, sorry support acts, as we were informed by an enthusiastic, but unbearably stupid geek from WRSI, the same one who was at the Lyle Lovett concert in fact.

First up then, was Chris Smithers, who turned out to be a perfecly amiable chap who told funny stories and sang Dylanesque songs about life, love and pain. Nothing wrong with that, I thought, between micro-sleeps.

Next we had the genuine treat of Franke and Hudson, Nanci's backing singers, who played and sang some pretty crackin' tunes of their own, mostly gorgeous, lilting country ballads with exquisite harmonies about life, love and pain. It seems that merely hanging around the wondrous Texan waif is inspiration in itself.

And then, the moment I'd been waiting for since the lights went up in Govan Hall on May 12, 1988. Nanci Griffith and the Blue Moon Orchestra with a new bass player to boot. It seems nothing ever changes. Also, no James Hooker (he was on paternity leave, Nanci told us). His replacement looked suspiciously like a Nashville sesh muso, but I decided not to hold it against him.

Jumping straight into her oldest "new" song, "Listen to the Radio," Nanci lookin' way cool in a baggy suit, led us on a perfectly enchanting through some of her finest moments including a "funky" "Last of the True Believers" a stompin' "Working Girl" (lookin' for the time) and a dreamy 'Once in a Very Blue Moon."

Eric Taylor's devastating "Deadwood, South Dakota" movingly captured the plight of Native Americans, while the new, "Back Seat Driver of America" revealed a new political edge. Nanci quite rightly, concentrated on material from her forthcoming album. As she puts it, "New songs are like pennies in my pocket, I have to spend 'em." So offered the wonderful poppiness of "Drive in Movies and Dashboard Lights," and the powerful Everlys-like "You Make this love a Teardrop Waiting to Fall" I clutched them to my chest, the nearest thing I could acquire to the roses she wasted on a couple of little brats to keep them quiet (unruly children are one of her pet peeves). I'll tell ya, if one of those stems had come my way I would have had it cryogenically frozen.

Inevitably many of my favorite songs did not find their way into what was, at any rate, a mesmerizing performance, but that's the problem with Nanci. Every one's a winner. She ended with a rockin' version of "Let it Shine on Me" which left me delirious with happiness, at the end of what had begun as a very trying day. But that's how it is with Nanci Griffith. Out of grey skies she has the miraculous ability to create fair summer evenings.

Jerome Bledsoe placed fourth in the long jump for UMass. Bledsoe, hampered by a strain in his quadracep, and facing bad weather conditions , was limited to a leap of 21'10 3/4', well below his personal best of 23'3/4'.

Other notable performances for UMass included Joe Edgerton's fourth in the shot put with a throw of 48'4', four feet farther than his previous best. Jeff White ran his fastest time(15.51) of the year in the 110 high hurdles, taking sixth. In the 5000, Jerry Squires, struggling with allergies, took third in 15:25.2, followed by teammate Billy Wallace who was fifth in 16:24.73. In the 100, Mike Grey ran to sixth place in 11.5.

Aprile relieved starter Chris Wanner early on in the second contest as UMass fell behind 4-1, then mashed a three-run homer in the top of the third frame to tie the score. In the bottom of the seventh, however, Rutgers reached Aprile for the game winning run on a hit batsman, a pair of bloop singles and a two out shot.

The Minutewomen rebounded yesterday in Philadelphia with a 7-2, 9-0 sweep. Wanner and Jen Devlin teamed up in a no-hit effort in the second game after Aprile picked up her second win of the weekend in the opener.

Wanner pitched five no-hit innings before giving the ball to Devlin, who completed the washout, while Barbara Meehan (2-for-3, two runs scored), Jen Miller (2-for-4) and Aprile (3-3) pounded away at the plate.

Successful year marks end for Gable, Soto

By KIM BRATER
Collegian Correspondent

As the warm weather descends upon us, the kind of weather most conducive for tennis, the University of Massachusetts men's tennis team wraps up its season with five wins and three losses.

"We had a good season overall, with a 5-3 record and sixth place at both A-10's and New Englands. Everyone played well," said UMass coach Manny Roberts. "[Brian] Gable's ankle hampered him a bit, but I'm happy with our record and the performance.

"Two out of the three teams we lost to this spring, we beat last semester. It goes back and forth."

Two of the Minutemen players will be leaving the squad. Both Gable and Humberto Soto are graduating in a few weeks. Gable, the number one singles player for the team during his entire four years here at UMass, will be heading out to San Diego to work for Pitney Bowes. But his racket will not collect dust as he plans to play in weekend tournaments in hopes to earn extra income.

"My four years here went well. I was a bit disappointed this spring because I felt I held back due to my ankle," said Gable.

The other senior on the squad is number five singles player Soto. "I had a good season and I'm happy with my six-win, two-loss finish. I liked playing for Manny, he's a great guy. Hopefully the tennis program will get better in the years to come," said Soto.

"Soto played well for the team. Considering he started as a sophomore, he brought in some big wins for us. Gable always played well. As far as I know, he's the first athlete to receive MVP four years in a row," commented Roberts.

Although the Minutemen will miss the playing of Gable and Soto, the team seems to be building up.

"We have a good incoming recruit class for next season, plus all our returning players," said Roberts.

Coming to play for the Minutemen are Barry Wadsworth who plays on the strong Penn State team. Wadsworth is transferring to UMass and is expected to play number one. Jeff Hesham from Andover was ranked in the top 20 in NELTA, and Scott Amerault hails from Long Island.

a bad starting position — lane eight — on the outside and she said, "the windy conditions hurt me on the corners." She crossed the line in 25.9 seconds, just nosing out the third-place runner.

The multi-talented freshman has qualified for next weekend's Eastern Championships in the 100, 200, and 400, but she will solely concentrate on the quartermile.

Another ECAC qualifier is Amy St. Pierre, who finished third in the 10,000 under extremely horrible weather conditions. She completed the roughly six-mile race in 39 minutes, but she could have won the event, as the winner ran a 37:47. St. Pierre's best time.

For the throwers, Simone Marisseau had an excellent day, as she threw a personal best in the shot put, 42 feet, 11¾ inches, for second place. She has also qualified for the Easterns.

Another qualifier, senior Carla DeSantis continued to slump as she finished third in the javelin, but the alarming fact was that she was beaten by two girls who had previously never thrown better than her.

In other results, the 4x800 relay team of Shana Smith, Sonja Vaughan, Cathy Crocker, and Michelle Pearlstine ran well, finishing fourth, and Smith finished sixth in the 1500 race. Also, freshman Sue McFadyen ran a nice 69-second 400 hurdle race.

What's left for this season is the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Championships next weekend at George Mason University in Fairfax, Virginia.

Hockey player may be extradited

MOSCOW (AP) — Soviet military authorities may seek the extradition of a Soviet hockey star on charges he deserted the Red Army when he defected to the United States, a Moscow newspaper said yesterday.

Lt. Alexander Mogilny disappeared Thursday in Stockholm, Sweden after helping the Soviet National Team win the World Hockey Championships.

The 20-year-old forward, considered one of the country's best prospects, arrived in the United States a day later on an airline ticket paid for by the Buffalo Sabres, the National Hockey League club that had chosen him in last year's player draft.

His story was recounted yesterday in the newspaper Sovietsky Sport under the headline, "The Golden Calf and the Horsethieves from Buffalo."

"HOW I MADE $18,000 FOR COLLEGE BY WORKING WEEKENDS."

When my friends and I graduated from high school, we all took part-time jobs to pay for college.

They ended up in car washes and hamburger joints, putting in long hours for little pay.

Not me. My job takes just one weekend a month and two weeks a year. Yet, I'm earning $18,000 for college.

Because I joined my local Army National Guard.

They're the people who help our state during emergencies like hurricanes and floods. They're also an important part of our country's military defense.

So, since I'm helping them do such an important job, they're helping me make it through school.

As soon as I finished Advanced Training, the Guard gave me a cash bonus of $2,000. I'm also getting another $5,000 for tuition and books, thanks to the New GI Bill.

Not to mention my monthly Army Guard paychecks. They'll add up to more than $11,000 over the six years I'm in the Guard.

And if I take out a college loan, the Guard will help me pay it back—up to $1,500 a year, plus interest.

It all adds up to $18,000—or more—for college for just a little of my time. And that's a heck of a better deal than any car wash will give you.

THE GUARD CAN HELP PUT YOU THROUGH COLLEGE, TOO. SEE YOUR LOCAL RECRUITER FOR DETAILS, CALL TOLL-FREE 800-638-7600,* OR MAIL THIS COUPON.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Today finds you full of renewed enthusiasm for life and your love relationships. Concentrate on listening and learning. Contact with an authority figure increases. Promote clever ideas.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You get a chance to impress those whose influence can help you realize a dream. Nothing will stop you now if you really concentrate. Your game plan comes off like clockwork. Share the applause.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Better let the object of your affection know how you feel if interested in developing a fuller relationship. You can create your own financial opportunities if you keep your eyes open.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Guard you image, but do not rest on your laurels. Focus on long-term goals while handling day-to-day chores. That is the way to become a winner! A personality conflict comes to an end.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your extraordinary stamina helps you face challenges, giving you a big advantage in both your relationships and business. New friends can be made this evening. You will feel romantic and show it.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): New recognition for past performances boosts your spirits. Forget old hurts and get on with your life. True happiness will follow. Money matters need your personal attention. Do not delegate critical decisions.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Short trips and phone calls are very productive now. An educational project will have a big payoff. Students find smoother sailing. Postpone signing documents until another day; better terms can be negotiated.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Your philosophy becomes clearer to others, improving your chances for expanding a relationship. Your mind teems with practical ideas. Stay in touch with former associates. You may want to team up again.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Good health depends largely on reducing the tension in your life. Better financial opportunities lie just around the corner. Close relationships are strengthened by a surprising revelation. Show your tender side.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Make a special effort to get ahead of schedule so you avoid last-minute work pressures. Personal decisions are easier to make than in the past. Be true to your high ideals.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A partnership improves after you both lay your cards on the table. Today's events have a positive effect on your finances. You find new ways to increase savings. Start a vacation fund.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A cooperative and positive attitude is the secret to success. Travel with mate if you want to mix business and pleasure successfully. Cash flow improves. Set aside funds for investment purposes.

first quarter, things were considerably brighter for UMass.

"We went in at the half and we felt like we were winning," said Hiller, who had five assists. "We just said we've got to get them back one at a time."

It was one thing for UMass to score, but another story to keep Syracuse off the board. LoCascio and his stellar supporting cast of defenders took care of that task, shutting down the Gaits brothers, Marechek and crew to the point of frustration.

"I've always said 'so goes LoCascio, so goes UMass'," Simmons said. "He's rarely off and he came up with the big saves."

LoCascio was so strong after the first quarter that the Gaits brothers, Gary and Paul, both went up to him and hugged him after the game. They weren't the only SU's players impressed.

"We got off to a quick start, but then we ran into a hot goalie," said SU's Greg Burns. "Our shots were in good spots, but I think he (LoCascio) was setting us up."

LoCascio finished the game with 19 saves, many of them of the spectacular, game-saving variety. But the shift in momentum and the strong all-around defensive effort also played a big role.

"We came out stale in the second half, and they were up for us," said Gary Gait, who had two goals.

"We were fresh in the first quarter, all pumped up, but they had a great midfield defense. They were taking the ball away a lot," added Paul Gait, who like his identical twin had two goals.

It was Paul who scored the first goal of the second half, matching SU's biggest lead at 9-3. But from there, Syracuse would go on a 19:10 dry spell, allowing UMass to make its run.

Soudan nailed home a sidewinder from Hiller at 3:46, and then McAleavey went behind-the-back in front to make it 9-5. And when Jamie Bergan found Chris Tyler back-door down the middle, UMass was within 9-6 and eyebrows were being raised.

"We were down 7-1 and we could have folded," McAleavey said.

"This team's got too much character to fold," LoCascio said.

Scott Hiller scored his 100th career goal and added five assists Saturday against Syracuse.

Scott Hiller's man-up 15-yarder at 2:55 of the fourth gave him his 100th career goal and cut it to 9-7, before Gary Gait got what would be a huge goal, bouncing off three defenders and beating LoCascio point-blank in the top right corner.

Tyler's second goal from long range made it 10-8 and Soudan completed a hat trick on a bouncer with 6:40 to go. The McGuirk crowd was elated and UMass looked primed to take over.

But Syracuse went on the defensive and was able to avert any final chances, including Soudan's last-second bid.

Regardless of the outcome, this was the type of game that UMass can carry through a hopefully-successful postseason ride.

"We beat them for 45 minutes. This is a big boost for the playoffs," Hiller said.

■ faceoffs and fans

Not to say that football players couldn't play lax. Jim Brown was highly regarded for his skills on the gridiron, but most people don't realize that he may be the greatest lacrosse player of all-time. It wouldn't be the first such case.

Come game day McKeown and MacRae were dressed, McKeown wearing the injured Chris Zusi's number 16, while MacRae had freshman Bruce Linson's usual 35.

Here was a guy (McKeown) who had been an All-America inside linebacker for the UMass football team, and had seen his share of the limelight in his four years with the Minutemen. And MacRae had played a key role as a fullback for UMass during its Yankee Conference title drive last season. What were they doing here?

"They asked my roommate, Joe Cullen (a UMass noseguard) if he wanted to do it, but he couldn't," McKeown said. "The next day coach Garber called and asked me."

"I didn't know what they wanted, but we practiced all week," MacRae said. "It was a great week. I was thrilled to be asked."

The experiment finally came under scrutiny at the start of the second quarter, as Garber inserted McKeown to square off with SU's Kirk Pratt with the Gorillas trailing, 7-1.

McKeown won his first faceoff before losing the next two. It would be the only action he or MacRae would see in the barn-burning 10-9 loss to the Orangemen Saturday.

They had only been part of the team for five days, but that was enough for them to fall for their new sport.

"I love it, but I never thought I'd play it. In fact, I hadn't seen it before I came here five years ago," said McKeown, who hails from that lacrosse hotbed of Biddeford, ME.

"I was excited. I'd never played organized before, but my brother and cousins played and I used to throw the ball around with them," MacRae said. "For us to come in this last week, the team wasn't upset. The guys worked with us and helped us out."

"The team's been great. They brought me in like I was one of them," McKeown said.

Garber had said before the game that, if his experiment decided the game it would be "the coaching move of the year." It wasn't really a factor, but it may before the season is over. McKeown plans to stick with the team through the playoffs and MacRae also said that he would if he was asked.

McKeown has played at McGuirk more than anyone else who was on the field Saturday, and he said he has never seen a crowd like the throng of 12,143 that was on hand for this classic.

"Lax crowds are incredible," McKeown said. "Usually at football games people are just hanging out."

But this wasn't even a typical lacrosse crowd. With cooperation from Mother Nature, a crowd the like that has never been seen on this campus filled the Stadium. The fans went wild as the Gorillas chipped away at Syracuse, and were nailed to the bleachers as UMass went down to the final seconds before falling.

Even then, the crowd rallied to give their team a great ovation for a superb effort.

But the most satisfying factor of the whole day was the crowd's behavior. Two years ago the Syracuse game was an ugly scene with orange-throwing stealing the show. Saturday the fans gave their team a big boost by staying under control and letting them play.

Syracuse holds off Gorillas, 10-9

coming oh-so-close. They had their chances to win the game, but just couldn't pull it out.

Syracuse had the ball, holding a 10-9 lead with under two minutes left. UMass had the ball deep in the Syracuse end, but turned it over. The Orangemen, by now frazzled by the closeness of the game, went conservative and tried to kill the clock.

"When was the last time Syracuse had to stall?" Garber asked.

It looked as if the Gorillas would go down without a final chance, the Orange playing a smart Dean Smith-like four-corner drill to keep UMass from getting one last shot.

"Obviously they had the fire going. The crowd was in it and they could smell victory," said SU coach Roy Simmons, Jr.

And UMass got its chance. The officials decided they didn't like the Syracuse stalling ways and called a delay of game with 18 seconds left. UMass called time out to set up one last effort.

On the play, the ball crossed midfield to Brett Jenks, who fed Tim Soudan as time was running down. Soudan, who had already tallied three times, crossed to the right and let one go that goalie Matt Palumb got a stick on as time expired.

"We were lucky, they had the ball and the clock was ticking down," Simmons said.

"All week, all we wanted was to be in position to win, and we were," LoCascio said.

The shocking factor may have been that UMass was even in telescopic range of winning, given what transpired in the first 15 minutes. The Orangemen, like they had to so many opponents this year, exploded for seven first period goals to take a 7-1 lead.

The Gorillas were all too familiar with Syracuse's firepower. And their worst nightmare was coming true as the Orange rattled off the game's first six goals. Some people may have been wondering just how bad the final outcome would be.

Soudan got the Gorillas on the board with 1:48 left in the period before Kirk Pratt won the ensuing faceoff and bolted downfield to beat LoCascio and make it 7-1 after one.

At that point, anyone bold enough to say that Syracuse would be limited to its worst offensive production of the year, would probably have been hauled off by the guys in the white coats.

But the Gorilla defense finally decided that enough was enough, holding the Orange to one goal in each of the last three quarters.

Jim McAleavey and Greg Collins each converted Scott Hiller feeds to cut it to 7-3 before Tom Marachek, the third part of the great Canadian Connection, picked up a rebound of a Gary Gait shot and show-timed it behind his back, giving the Orange an 8-3 lead at the half.

They trailed by five, but given the prospects after the Faceoffs and football players; fans and fruit

By JIM CLARK

It was a scene best set for April Fools' Day, but this was serious business.

The nation's second-best lacrosse team was in town, ready to give the University of Massachusetts its biggest test of the season. So what were these two football players doing parading the sidelines of Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium — in lax uniforms?

Call it the "Great Faceoff Experiment" of UMass coach Dick Garber. Staring at the prospect of getting blown out by the powerful Orangemen, who utilize their strength on faceoffs to hold the ball for ridiculous amounts of time, Garber decided to summon some help to bolster the UM chances on the draw.

Hello, John McKeown and Duncan MacRae.

The idea of football players playing in the biggest lacrosse game of the season was almost too funny to be true. But there they were, McKeown and MacRae, working out along with teammates Allen Williams and David Mitchell, practicing faceoffs last week.

Softball picks up 3-of-4

The University of Massachusetts softball team wrapped up its Atlantic 10 regular season schedule this weekend south of the border, splitting a pair at Rutgers on Saturday and pounding Saint Joseph's during two more yesterday.

"We're getting a lot of hits," said coach Elaine Sortino. "We're putting good hits together and scoring runs."

In so doing, UMass clinched the second seed in this weekend's A-10 tournament with a 9-3 league record, and improved to 30-16 overall. The Minutewomen will finish their regular season at home Tuesday with a doubleheader against Adelphi, currently the second ranked team in the Northeast. Both teams are chasing at-large invitations to the NCAA tournament.

The Minutewomen blanked the Scarlet Knights in Saturday's opener behind Holly Aprile (19-9), 1-0, then fell in the second game 5-4. UMass scored the lone run of the first game in the fifth inning, when Mary Duff singled, stole second base and scored on a single from Cherie DellAnno.

In tossing a patented four-hit shutout, Aprile stranded six runners and pitch-

Baseball gets 10-8 win

By DENNIS MADSEN

NEW BRITAIN, Conn. — The University of Massachusetts baseball team survived some wildness last night to take a 10-8 win from Central Connecticut State University at Muzzi Field.

With the win, the Minutemen snapped a seven-game losing streak and improved to 17-25 on the season. They hadn't won since beating the same Central Connecticut team, 11-3 on April 25 at Lorden Field.

UMass escaped with the victory as senior righthander Dave Telgheder worked out of a bases-loaded jam in the ninth inning by striking out the final batter of the game. Telgheder had come on in the fourth inning in relief of starter Paul Ciaglo, and gave up just two hits while striking out seven.

Ciaglo ran into rough times right away as ne walked five batters in the first inning, allowing the Blue Devils to take a 3-1 lead.

UMass rallied to tie it at 3-3 in the second and went ahead 6-4 after three. Central Connecticut finished Ciaglo in the fourth with a pair of runs, aided by three of Ciaglo's five wild pitches on the game. In all, he also yielded eight walks, but allowed only two hits himself.

UMass went ahead for good in the fifth inning as freshman shortstop Glen DiSarcina smacked a single down the line in right field to bring him Brian Bright and Derek Dana. DiSarcina finished the day 4-for-5 at the plate while driving in five runs.

The Minutemen added single runs in the sixth and seventh to go up, 10-6 before CCSU got two in the seventh to end the scoring.

Dana was 1-for-4 with three runs scored while Dave Edwards added four runs to the UMass offense.

UM track teams run well in championship meets

The University of Massachusetts men's track team was in fine form at the Eastern Championships Saturday, taking third behind the University of Vermont and the University of New Hampshire amongst a 20-team field in Burlington, VT.

Host UVM was a sort of surprise winner, grabbing 137 points, while second place UNH totaled 121. UMass finished with 81 points.

"We did a little bit above what I anticipated," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien, "I think the kids really responded to the championship thing well. We had 10 or 15 potential scorers. Every one of them came through."

Things looked good at the beginning for UMass, as Joe Livorsi and Jon Corso took first and second in the first running event of the day, the 10,000 meters. Livorsi's time of 32:06.2 was just ahead of Corso, who crossed the finish line in 32:10.0. Livorsi, an unexpected winner, went from dark horse to Kentucky thouroughbred. "It was a surprise to other people. We certainly knew of his ability," said O'Brien.

In the steeplchase, UMass' Jim McDonald chopped 10 seconds off his best time, taking first in 9:14.4. Also for the men, Fitz Hagan was third with 9:18.1, and Herb Heffner took fourth in 9:21.9.

Steve Tolly finished second for UMass in the 1500, running a 2:02 split and then pouring it on to finish in 3:50.4. Tolly, who was last year's New England champion in the 1500, ran very well.

"He looks the best he's looked in two years." said O'Brien.

The relay teams also looked good. The 4x100 team of Felix DeLaRosa, Evon Walters, Mike Grey, and Kevin Walters placed fifth in what was a very competitive race, according to O'Brien. Their time of 42.94 was their fastest time of the year by a full second. The 4x400 team of DeLaRosa, Evon Walters, Steve Brown, and Garfield Vaughn took second in 3:18.4, just a second behind winner Southern Connecticut.

The 400 meters was perhaps the most competitive race of the day. Brown and Vaughn placed third and sixth in the race

Sprinter Lee Ann Ambrose was the highlight of this weekend for the University of Massachusetts women's track team as she was crowned the New England Champion in the 400 meters. She won the event easily and in addition, was the runner-up in the 200.

Ambrose won the quartermile with a clocking of 55.9 seconds, setting a personal record. Though the day was filled with rain, she said, "The track was fast, and I had a really good race." On the first straightaway, she had a Vermont girl on her tail, but by the halfway mark, the race was over.

Fifty minutes later, Ambrose got back onto the Colby track for the finals of the 200. Though seeded third, Ambrose was given

Police search pond for missing student

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

Amherst police and rescue workers from the Hadley Aquatic Unit combed Puffer's Pond in North Amherst yesterday looking for the body of a University of Massachusetts student who has been missing since Saturday, police said.

Paul W. Ryan, the missing student, and his friend David Lennon were swimming early Saturday evening when Lennon went over the dam at one end of the pond, said Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia.

Lennon, who is still hospitalized, was found near the base of the dam, bleeding from the head and mouth.

According to witnesses, Ryan was seen as Lennon went over the dam, but vanished immediately afterward.

Lennon was listed in fair condition with internal injuries yesterday at the Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, after being transferred from the intensive care unit to the orthopedic wing, a hospital spokeswoman said.

There is some confusion as to how many people were actually swimming with Ryan and Lennon. Eric Bronner, who was near the dam but not in a direct line of sight, said he thought he heard numerous people in the area.

After Lennon went over the dam, Bronner saw "what looked like three of four of [Lennon's] buddies come down. It looked like [they were friends] because they were all wet."

Maia said the search will be resumed today and police are hopeful the water level will recede, making the search easier. Yesterday, the force of the water was hampering the divers' efforts to tell what they were touching with their search poles, he said.

Suspensions spark hunger strike

Students vow to continue until anti-military protestors are reinstated

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Six University of Massachusetts students started a hunger strike at midnight Sunday, vowing to continue until the students who were recently suspended from the University for violating the picketing code are reinstated.

Five of the hunger strikers said yesterday they will go on indefinitely without food, and one striker, Charles Lenchner, said he will go as long as possible without food or water.

"I've tried fasting on Yom Kippur many times, but I never succeeded," Lenchner said. "This time I'll make it. This is stronger than religion, it's a fear of the military." "The administration is misusing the interim suspension clause in the Code of Student Conduct, and suspending us without due process," David Eoll, a striker and suspended UMass student.

Under the interim suspension clause, school officials can suspend students without a hearing if the students pose an imminent threat to themselves, other people, or University property.

"Although we may have been annoying, we haven't posed any threats in any of the peaceful protests," Eoll said. "They don't have a right doing what they did — infringing our democratic rights."

Student government leaders at UMass disagree with the administration's decision to suspend the protesters.

"I think it's grossly unfair to suspend the students without a hearing," Stephanie Orefice, student trustee, said. "It is a violation of due process."

Several protesters tried to meet with Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs, in his office yesterday, but he was at a meeting and could not talk to the students.

"Since Dennis Madson refused to talk to us to justify his actions, our next step is a civil liberties suit," Andy Sirulnik, a UMass suspended student said.

At least eight students are temporarily fasting to support the people in the hunger strike and to protest the suspensions. The people said they will fast for a few days, and when they decide to eat, others will start fasting to continue the ritual.

The strikers and fasters sat in the lobby of the Whitmore Administration Building yesterday, as the students who were arrested in the Marcus Hall and Memorial Hall occupations had hearings with an impartial hearing board in the Dean of Students office.

The hearings dealt with the charges brought against students in the first two occupations, and not with

Anti-homosexual harassment prompts LBGA rally today

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Members of the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance say it is neither anger nor fear that will drive them to rally on the steps of the Student Union building today — but a need to respond to escalating accounts of homophobic harassment on campus.

LBGA president Billy Curtis said yesterday the noon "speakout" was prompted by the return of part of the LBGA's banner last week.

> "I know they're trying to strike fear into us, but it only makes us very strong."
> --LBGA President Billy Curtis

The banner, which was decorated with a charging lavender rhinoceros symbolizing the gay, lesbian, and bisexual civil rights movement, hung from the second floor of the Student Union for barely three months before it was stolen last February.

Last Tuesday, a wrinkled white envelope, addressed to the LBGA in block print, arrived — containing only the rhino's head marked by a simulated bullet hole punched through its brow, Curtis said. The hole was outlined with red marker, apparently signifying blood.

"I know they're trying to strike fear into us, but it only makes most of us very strong," he said, adding that no one has claimed responsibility for sending the envelope.

The word "UTOPIA" was inscribed in place of a return address on the envelope, which Curtis said may represent an underground group that existed on campus five or six years ago. The group advocated the removal of all minority groups on campus.

"It's a mentality I cannot even understand," he said. "You can't get rid of the LBGA community. That's like saying 'let's get rid of all the left-handed people.' "

Curtis said verbal assaults on members of the LBGA community have increased since he received the letter. He added that he does not know of any physical assaults being reported.

Ben Eder, an LBGA member who made the banner, said it is possible that members of UTOPIA are resurfacing but added he is not ruling out the involvement of other groups.

charges resulting from the Graduate Research Center occupation last Thursday, said Gladys Rodrigues, associate dean of students.

The people who were arrested after the occupation of an office in the Graduate Research Center met separately with members of the Dean of Students staff yesterday. The staff decided whether the interim suspensions would be lifted or removed.

"The protesters who were first offenders were removed from temporary suspension, pending review," Madson said. "If a person involved in the last situation had a history of discipline problems at the University, they remained on suspension."

"Chancellor Duffey, Provost O'Brien and I made the decision to use the interim suspension because we couldn't tolerate the continued disruptions, and because we didn't want to have people arrested," Madson said.

Madson said he does not want to infringe on the students' rights to demonstrate — provided they do not violate the picketing code.

■ harrassment

"It's horrible to think there are people out here with this kind of mentality," Eder said. "You just have to feel sorry for the person who's going through all this trouble to send such a message out."

The majority of the LBGA community is not alarmed by the "message," Eder said, but instead they consider it "a slap in the face" after last month's LBGA awareness week, which featured education about the community.

"I see it as a message of hatred but I don't fear for my life," he said. "This reaffirms what it is we're trying to fight — what it is we're trying to end."

An additional effort is underway to enhance awareness by registering a course on campus about lesbian, bisexual and gay awareness to fulfill a general education requirement, he said.

"The only thing you can do is try and raise the awareness of people in hopes that it will do something," he said.

Faculty panel to talk funds

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

A panel discussion of the pros and cons of military-funded research at the University of Massachusetts is scheduled for 8 p.m. today in Mahar auditorium .

The Faculty and Staff for Human Rights and a Responsible University is sponsoring the forum, "Should there be Department of Defense-Funded research at UMass?"

William Adrion, faculty in the computer information sciences department and Ronald Archer, chemistry, are scheduled to speak in favor of the research. Michael Klare, a Five College professor, and Robert Wolff, a philosophy professor, are slated to voice their opposition to it. The professors will field questions from the audience.

"This is primarily an educational venture," said Professor Gerard Braunthal, an organizer of the event. "We want to educate the University community on the issue."

Provost Richard O'Brien is scheduled to moderate the event.

"It will not be an informative session if an employee of the University of O'Brien's caliber is facilitator," Emily Katz, a Hampshire College student said. "He has too much vested in the crackdown by the administration on students to do any kind of reasonable job as moderator."

"We are trying to bring the administration and students together, trying to bridge the gap between both parties," Braunthal said. "A forum will serve as that bridge."

Faculty and Staff for Human Rights and a Responsible University as a group is critical of the degree of funding on campus, Braunthal said.

The forum is free and open to the public.

Sign language campaign begins

A campaign to introduce American Sign Language as an alternative to standard foreign language requirements at the University of Massachusetts is underway, sparked by the combined efforts of student groups on campus.

A meeting to discuss the issue of adding ASL to the curriculum is scheduled for at 7 p.m. today in Campus Center 811B-15.

Student Mart Boulerice said many people on campus do not realize English is a second language to deaf people and they should not be required to fulfill an additional foreign language to receive a degree.

"If they would offer classes [in ASL], it would be so good for the school," he said, adding that a class to certify interpreters for the deaf would meet a serious need on campus.

Boulerice said a bill is pending in the state Legislature which, if passed, would require state colleges and universities to incorporate sign language into their curriculum.

Library fights for funding as state budget cuts loom

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts library is under siege because the state Legislature has completely cut funding for book and periodical purchases — so library officials are organizing a letter-writing campaign to fight back, Director of Libraries Richard Talbot said yesterday.

"Time is of the essence because [the Senate Ways and Means Committee] will probably finish its deliberations on Thursday," he said.

Information, including the names and addresses of committee members, will be made available to students in the Tower library, he said.

The situation is so desperate because the part of the state budget that funds all 29 state university and college libraries was eliminated by the state House of Representatives Ways and Means Committee, he said.

History Professor Louis Greenbaum, chairman of the faculty senate library committee, said any reduction or elimination of funds to the library erodes the quality of the University and the ability of faculty and students to do meaningful research here.

"The library is essential to higher education. The library is the metaphor for quality education. Once you start eroding it then you can kiss it away," he said.

If the senate committee does not restore funding, the library will have to cancel 55 percent of journal and periodical purchases and reduce book acquisitions by 66 percent, Talbot said.

Massachusetts ranks 51st nationally for library support, out of all states and the District of Columbia, Talbot said. And the UMass library ranks 53rd out of 107 research libraries, including 12 in Canada, he said.

"If we don't get this funding we will fall very sharply" in the national standings, he said.

Commuter Area Government still without a president

Student Judiciary blocks second CAG election

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The Commuter Area Government will remain without a president until the question of whether errors by ballot box workers during the first race warrant a second election is resolved, the Student Judiciary ruled last week.

"They cannot hold another election," said Student Attorney General Robert Fadel. "There will be an injunction until the issue is resolved."

The ruling stemmed from Commuter Area Sen. Bob McDevitt's petition, filed two weeks ago, asking the court to block the Commuter Area Governing Board's decision to hold a second presidential election.

The board based its ruling on ballot box workers' failure to check voter eligibility in at least 13 instances during the first election and the discovery that at least one person voted from the Greek Area, which is not considered part of the Commuter Area.

In the first elections held nearly one month ago, co-candidates Tim Reilly and Alex Zarganes defeated co-candidates Robb Smith and Ted Chambers by four votes in an election marred by negative campaigning by outside parties.

The Smith/Chambers campaign immediately contested the election results, citing ballot box workers' errors and adding that false posters were circulated both on and off campus claiming the pair opposed spring concerts in favor of channeling all funds into the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance.

The board dismissed the negative campaigning complaint, claiming it "didn't hold water" and nullified the elections based on procedural errors.

McDevitt petitioned the court to block the second election, which was scheduled for last Thuraday, but later postponed so students could attend hearings on state budget cuts in Springfield.

The petition requested the court to immediately install Reilly and Zarganes in office as CAG co-presidents, but was dismissed by the student justices, who said it was filed incorrectly.

Fadel said a second complaint has been filed by McDevitt, who could not be reached for comment.

Student with learning disability makes the grade

Eigth in a series on life at the University of Massachusetts

A pseudonym has been used for the student discussed.

Lynne, a University of Massachusetts student, insists that she is just like everyone else, despite the obstacles she has to face every time she enters a classroom.

Lynne entered the University last semester like many others. Yet, the thing that makes Lynne different is her learning disability which has shown up repeatedly in standardized testing.

Since she had academic problems in high school, she knew that she was going to need some specialized attention. This prompted her to seek out counseling at the Learning Disabled Student Services last fall.

"My disability has not really had an effect on me because I have gotten help and it is definitely under control," Lynne said. "I don't feel I have a learning disability, but it is there in my testing."

All students who indicate they have a learning disability are contacted by the LDSS when they arrive at UMass. There are about 300 students who seek counseling at one time or another. These students are assigned a case manager. Learning-disabled students can take tests without time constraints, and take them in a separate room from the rest of the class.

Beacons of peace

Militant. Liberal. Self-centered. "Socially aware." It's easy to describe Amherst politics in a few words. My favorite summary of it is a 1960's slogan: "Make love, not war," an amalgamation of the sexual revolution and the peace movement.

Rusty Denton

One would think that after all these years of political enlightenment, the Amherst area would be a radiant beacon of love and peace. We have more civility training than probably any other area in the nation. We have myriad programs to affirm people of both conventional and alternative sexual orientations; in fact, sexual activity on campus is so prodigious, it's a wonder students have any time to protest. We have an amazingly large population of professional counselors with hundreds of techniques to help you become a more loving, more peaceful, more fulfilled person. We have more than our share of "spiritual" resources; several major cults own property in the area, and representatives of occult groups and Eastern religions are as common as political activists.

But love and peace? There isn't much of that. Local faculty and students alike have a reputation among retailers as being some of the rudest, most obnoxious and least responsible customers in New England. And whenever there's a protest on campus, what you see is not love; it's hostility toward anyone who disagrees. That kind of enmity is seen in local marriages, as well — by the time their kids get to high school, almost all couples in Amherst are divorced, and the kids will do anything for affection. Does that sound like people who know how to build a loving society?

I don't think so. I think it sounds like people whose estimation of their own importance is so exalted that they look down on the mere mortals they have to put up with in their daily routines. It sounds like people who have expectations that others find difficult, if not impossible, to live with.

Now I'm not saying such folk have no compassion for their fellow humans. These are the same people who are shocked and outraged whenever there's rape or racism or gay-bashing or an otherwise inhumane incident on our utopian campus. Being from Amherst, they're the kind of people who will readily adopt a cause for the less fortunate and press it until some kind of concession is gained from the powers that be.

But maybe their willingness to be surprised by the depravity and selfishness of human nature is part of the problem. I'm not shocked by the hate and prejudice that keep cropping up in our little paradise. I'm surprised if it doesn't show up.

It's a real commentary on someone's naivete and pride when they believe human nature is basically good and rational. People who believe that must likewise believe that they themselves are naturally loving and have no need to bridle their own unreasonable expectations of others. They believe nothing they do is selfish; therefore they never muzzle their selfish tendencies. With a campus and a town full of people who think that way, it's not surprising that all you ever hear about in Amherst is their rights and the failures of others to observe them. They're bitter.

If people can't make their ideology of love and peace bring those things into their own relationships, then they don't know what they think they know. In my book, personal character is even more important than ideology, and I don't take lessons on love or peace from selfish, hostile and bitter people.

The issue may bear on our immediate future. I hypothesize that movements repeat themselves in every generation — a cycle of thirty years or so — and that means America in the 1990's could be very much like America of the 1960's, still represented by the Amherst area today. The ideology of that prospect may thrill you. The selfishness and arrogance that go with it appall me.

Research isn't just for war

As a graduate student at the University of Massachusetts for the past six years, I continue to be shocked at the lack of scientific literacy in the general undergraduate population. Recent letters to the editor show there are professors who could certainly benefit from a subscription to Scientific American, or at least a course in the history of science.

Margaret A. Rakas

Fallacy number one: The DOD-sponsored research on campus is responsible for atrocities committed in Central America, and helps make more efficient killing machines for the U.S. Military.

Truth: Has anybody looked up the number of security clearances held by graduate students on this campus? I doubt any of us have one. That means we don't do classified research, we don't have access to classified documents, and anything significant that we do can be published in the open literature. Where does real military research go on? At some of the national labs and at some military labs — where everybody has a security clearance. When the military wants killing machines built, the details won't be published in the Journal of Chemical Physics.

Fallacy number two: There are relatively few civilian spin-offs from military research.

Truth: I suggest you avoid flying. Those great guidance systems (like radar) that enable the plane to land safely even at night, or in a storm, were developed with DOD money. Plan to drive a car? No way, baby. Those tires were made with synthetic rubber compounds that were (gasp!) developed with DOD money, due to problems in obtaining the real thing during WWII. Your grandma has glaucoma but laser surgery will restore her sight in an operation that's relatively painless and risk-free? Tell her she's got to live with the glaucoma; all that laser technology was developed with nasty DOD money. Pray to God you're never badly burned and require artificial skin grafts because you have so little skin of your own left. That pioneering research was paid for with Army money. Much of this research was carried out at universities, by graduate students and professors.

Fallacy: We should be exploring conversion research.

Truth: There is a fair-sized program studying wind and power in the Mechanical Engineering department. There is a low degree of nation-wide interest in exploring alternative energy. This is reflected in the popularity of the bigger cars. The government and Joe Random don't believe there's any reason to worry. Scientists are not happy with this attitude, but Americans only seem to be able to handle one crisis at a time. We look for the short-term gain, whether it's in the stock market, our income tax refund, or the ease of not separating our trash for recycling. Beyond that, are you going to dictate to professors what they can and cannot work on? Are you going to force an electrical engineering professor to build wind mills, just because s/he works with robotics that could fire a gun or help a paraplegic live better?

I've met very few people who don't consider the ethical implications of what they do. We are not robots, nor are we heartless. There are people who do work that I could not do and still sleep at night. Besides some scientists, these include the people who mount cigarette advertising campaigns, people who create an insatiable appetite for consumer goods (thus consuming natural resources, money, and electricity), and junk bond traders.

I don't understand why someone in the administration hasn't explained that DOD money (or any research money) helps fund resources all over the campus. For every dollar of outside research money that comes into UMass, half goes directly to UMass. This portion does not pay the graduate student doing the work, or pay the professor, or buy supplies. It pays the salaries of TA's, or helps pay operating costs for the libraries. Nationwide, universities are scrambling to get government and industry-supplied research dollars, because graduate-level research is what attracts the best professors, the best academic reputation and helps universities financially. While the leftists are screaming about how terrible the DOD-sponsored research is, W. Greg Rothman will be proclaiming how wonderful it is that UMass has the opportunities to defend our shores by producing death machines. The truth is nowhere near either of these extremes.

Margaret A. Rakas is a UMass graduate student

Protesters want communication

It is shocking, but not surprising, to consider the way the University of Massachusetts security and administration have reacted to the recent demonstrations about military-funded research on campus. Protesters occupied a couple of offices in the Graduate Research Center low-rise; in response, the security forces locked the entire low-rise building, including the science library. The protesters had never been in or near the library. In fact, anyone who spoke to the demonstrators outside the building would have found out that there was no intention of destruction of property. The intention was to get the University to discuss whether and how research here contributes to warfare. In principle, a university is concerned with analysis and thought (which then imply understanding and prediction). When a question is raised in a non-violent (if forceful) way, we can respond with analysis — in this case, serious discussion amongst students, faculty, staff, and administrators about military-funded research.

Instead, when approaching the science library, I found that the doors had been chained by police, and that the windows were covered with paper. Twenty-four hours later, a university bus with police dressed in riot gear drove up to the GRC. They entered the building and guarded the entrance. About 45 minutes later, they started arresting students.

The issues being raised are not "academic." Warfare, whether nuclear, biological, or "low-intensity" is a serious real-world issue for those affected.

Support suspended student protesters

Last Thursday, 35 students were arrested for occupying an administrative office in the Graduate Research Center, protesting the Defense Department funding at this university.

Meredith O'Brien

These protesters occupied administrative offices — not the library and not the facilities used by students.

It was an administrative decision to close down the Grad Center — which caused an inconvenience for students. The protesters were trying to disrupt the lives of the administrators, not the lives of the students.

These students selected the offices in the Grad Research Center because that particular office handles the funding that is received from the Department of Defense. This was the location that acted as the forum for the protesters' outrage.

The administration has been ignoring the due process of the law. It has threatened to take away the protesters' status as students as a direct result of their arrest for occupying buildings on campus.

The status of "student" was legally defined as property in a 1970 Supreme Court case that ruled that all entitlements, i.e. student status, are property. Without due process, property can not be legally taken away. It is my understanding that these protesters were simply told that they would be expelled if they did not leave the buildings that have recently been occupied.

That is not due process. The administration said it would expel these students upon their arrest. They did not wait for a show/cause hearing. They did not speak to the protesters individually to enable them to defend themselves. They simply told the protesters that they would be suspended, before there had been a formal hearing.

What ever happened to the democratic ideal of innocent until proven guilty? Since when can a student get thrown out of the university for peacefully protesting? Since when does the Code of Student Conduct supersede the US Constitution?

Regardless of the student body's views on Defense Department funding, it should back the rights of the students to protest.

Everyone needs to realize that any building that is taken over will disrupt the normal flow of campus life. Protesters won't take over an empty building that nobody cares about. If people want to protest, they want to do it publicly, not in some obscure part of the campus — to do so would be missing the whole reason why buildings are taken over. The students of this University should, despite their views on the Defense Department funding, support and defend the rights of their fellow students to criticize this University.

Not only would the student body be defending the rights of these protesters, but the rights of all of the students that attend this University.

Some time in the future, different groups may find that they are outraged by the actions of this University. These groups may want to protest. They may find it necessary to take over buildings to display the seriousness of their anger.

It would be comforting to know that this group would have the full support of the UMass community behind them and their right to publicly protest, despite how the entire University feels about the issue.

If the students continue to argue among themselves about what building should be taken over or what issue is of importance to this campus, the administration will be able to continually abuse student rights. All of the students should set aside their views and their short-term goals to look at the long-range implications of the slowly eroding rights of students.

Patricia Gillespie-Silver, head of the LDSS, said the service provides a "small, safe environment" for learning-disabled students who are qualified.

"The students who seek counseling with us have been admitted to the University on their own merit. They all have good transcripts and GPA's. We just provide services that will help those students adapt to the new situation," she said.

But the LDSS can only do so much. It is the students who have to acknowledge they need help and take the initiative to get it, according to Lynne.

"UMass doesn't cater to me. If someone needs help, they need to go get it themselves," she said.

Gillespie-Silver acknowledges that many students with learning disabilities may deny that they have a problem. They try to make it on their own, when it is obvious they need academic help.

"There are so many students here who think, 'I can do it on my own. I don't need you.' Then they fail and see they can't do it. Unfortunately, it is usually after they fail, they see they need our help," Gillespie-Silver said.

Lynne correlates the term "disabled" with "handicapped," but she doesn't feel either of those terms apply to her.

"I am not restricted from anything at UMass because of my learning disability. In fact, most people don't even know that I have a problem. I tell my close friends about it, but I don't flaunt it. I really don't see the point because I'm normal in every other sense," she said.

Like many other non-disabled students at the University, Lynne feels her biggest problem is balancing her priorities of school and other activities. The thing that makes it more difficult is the fact that she has to spend more time studying than other students.

"I have to take more time out to study because I can't just cram for a test the night before. I have to reread things many more times than someone else. Instead of studying two days before an exam, I have to start a week before. But, I can do just as well as anyone else and it is reflected in the grades I get," Lynne said.

Gillespie-Silver said that the most important thing the LDSS does is provide a link between the student and the faculty member. When the professor is aware of the students' problem, the professor is more likely to accomodate the students' needs.

"Basically, we provide consistent, personal monitoring and support. Since all our students are mainstreamed, the LDSS is a place where students can come to get specialized attention that they couldn't get from other places," Gillespie-Silver said.

Fire up the plastic cash, a case of Visa-abuse

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

As the end of the semester draws near and stress levels fly through the roof, I can think of no better way to blow off steam than to charge up ridiculous amounts of money buying compact discs. Then, to justify my rampant expenditure (out of my own pocket no less - none of this "expense account" pussyfooting here) I write about it here, and pretend that it was a necessary exercise. Thomson's laughable attack on my testicular fortitude (I think you're being evasive, Jon. Ed.) doesn't even deserve a response. anyway, I've had enough of this stupid junkie in-fighting. I've just returned from a particularly arduous bout of Visa-abuse and I've got bigger fish to fry.

DISC

JUNKIE

It's been a while since I've indulged my personal weakness for industrial dance music a la Skinny Puppy, Ministry et al. The slab of aluminum that currently has my delicates in a twist is the latest single from Canada's excellent Front-Line-Assembly. The group features ex-Skinny Puppy member Bill Leeb (who used to appear under the alias William Schroeder), and sounds a lot like you'd expect a band containing ex Puppy members to sound. To elucidate, there's percussion enough to demolish a building, nightmare voices and sinister synths. This particular release, entitled Digital Tension Dementia suffers from what some people (yours truly NOT included) consider a major pitfall of many industrial 12's in that the tunes run for a long time. Personally like 8 minute tunes with hypnotic grooves. If this is your cup of tea as well, then check this out. If you tire easily, you may find earlier releases such as the album "Disorder" or the mini LP Corrosion more to your liking. Any way you cut it, this band is worth investigating.

"In a black and white world, murder brings a touch of color." So says the quote on the front cover of ex-Bad Seed Barry Adamson's Moss Side Story. I must admit that I initially found the idea of a wordless concept album rather bizarre, but once I actually listened to it, I knew that this was something unique. Basically, it's one of those hard-boiled detective stories replete with bombshell babes and square-jawed private dicks. Sex and death - this album has it all. That it manages to convey all these impressions without recourse to anything so mundane as lyrics speaks highly of Adamson's sonic technique. You might call it a soundtrack album except for the fact that the movie only exists in Adamson's imagination. Musically, it owes a lot to swing and jazz of the 1940's, although Adamson does introduce an 80's element via industrial sound-effect loops and heavy rhythms. Amazingly the debt to the past does not detract from the freshness and originality of this album in the slightest. I can find no fault with any facet of this album, be it playing, production or otherwise. I do wish that adamson had provided more clues as to the actual details of the plot, but the blame lies in my own barren imagination, rather than a failing on the composer's part. My highest accolades go out to Adamson. I suspect this will be the year's big sleeper (read much critical acclaim, much less actual sales). Don't miss out - take a walk on the Moss Side.

Entertainment: not bad for amateurs

That's Entertainment - A Musical Extravaganza
Bowker Auditorium
April 28

The University Players presented That's Entertainment - A Musical Extravaganza last week at the Bowker Auditorium. The title is a lot to live up to, especially for an amatuer effort. While the show did not live up to everything it seemed to want to, it certainly tried, and witnessing the energy of these attempts was worth seeing the show. The production also had a number of wonderful performers and . . . Well, to get the bad news out of the way . . . a main problem was a lack of projection from the singers. It was actually hard to hear the voices a lot of the time. This is a problem for a musical revue. Worse than this though was that the most sparkling performers of the show were terribly underused, while those who graced the stage most often lacked something; a certain je ne sais quois, I think.

THEATER

But, the good news. The costuming was especially good, dressing the cast of twenty five and changing costumes for every number, while staying faithful to the spirit of the 1930's and '40's. Both the set and the lighting were done simply, leading the focus of the show to the performances.

"Anything You Can Do" was the standout piece of the evening. It revealed the talents of two performers, Bill Larkin and Kristie Tincher, who were also standouts from the ensemble cast. Marc Clermont, Andrew Shreiver and Kimberly McDonough (who pulled off the impossible; singing "Somewhere Over the Rainbow" without making anyone squirm) were also bright spots in the show.

The cake has to be handed to Miss Tincher, however, who made more of her limited time on stage than others made with too much time.

The orchestra was composed of Bill Stewich on drums and Bill Larkin again on piano. They played all 44 songs extremely well, and while they did on occasion drown out the singers' voices, this had more to do with the aforementioned volume problem of the cast. Larkin also jumped up to do a very fresh and original working of Abbott and Costello's "Who's on First?" comedy routine with Jeff Johnson playing the straight man.

All in all, the University Players presented an amateur, yet effecting homage to the classic M.G.M. musicals. And if at times there was a slight deja vu feeling concerning high school, the sheer energy of Bonnie L. Borremo's work shattered such cynical convictions. A valiant attempt filled with potential that it occasionally lived up to. I'm glad I saw it.

MTV metal fest is pretty good

Anthrax, Helloween, Exodus
Orpheum Theater
May 4

BOSTON - "The heaviest tour of the season, the heaviest night of your life," claims the ad for the MTV Headbanger's Ball Tour. Considering the lineup of Anthrax, Helloween, and Exodus, one would expect that such a claim would be true. However, judging from last week's Orpheum show, it could be said that perhaps the recent Queensryche-Metallica tour was a little heavier, more intense and more energetic. But nevertheless, as tours go, this one is pretty good.

The first act to perform was Exodus, a thrash metal group from the San Francisco Bay area. They were nothing short of incredible. Their sound was clean, tight and crunchy. Their stage presence was magnetic and powerful. The crowd certainly enjoyed this band, especially when they played "Toxic Waltz," a song which they have just released a video for and which is off the latest album, Fabulous Disaster. Their spectacular performance came as no surprise since Exodus was one of the first thrash bands on the metal scene and one of their founding members was Kirk Hammett, now lead guitarist for Metallica. their set was short, the crowd still roared in appreciation with the strength that could cause a sizeable tremor.

For a metal band to put on a successful show, the energy level must be high, which it was that night, and the intensity level of the band must be higher. Sadly enough, the second act, Helloween, a progressive metal group from West Germany, lacked stage presence and command over the crowd's attention. With the exception of the first song, technically, the performance was superb. However, the only real powerful moment of the show was when the band played their last song, "How Many Tears," from their first album, Walls of Jerico. And this moment was only intense because the song itself was intense. Overall, Helloween's performance was not a big disappointment, but a disappointment all the same.

The same cannot be said for Anthrax. As the lights dimmed, the crowd rushed to the front. The Orpheum was turned into a moshing madhouse, with people slamming in their seats and in the aisles, and even stage diving. The crowd hungered for powerful melodies and pounding rhythms and Anthrax fed them a pleasant diet of old and new songs. Above all, Anthrax was fun to watch. Their stage was set up the same way as it appeared on MTV. When they played "Indians," lead singer Joey Belladonna donned his indian feathers and moshed up and down the ramps and all around the stage. Actually it was surprising to see Anthrax put on such a good show since their latest album, State of Euphoria, lacks the raw energy found on their earlier vinyl.

Outside of the theater after the show, while nobody actually seemed speechless or blown away, most appeared content in the fact that they had gotten their money's worth. If you get a chance, I suggest you catch the MTV Headbanger's Ball tour when it comes to the Springfield Civic Center. Judge for yourself if this is the heaviest tour of the season, and . . . the heaviest night of your life.

Color Traps, a play developed, written and performed by students from the University of Massachusetts will be presented this afternoon at Bartlett auditorium, Rm. 65 in the basement of Bartlett Hall. Show begins at 1:15 p.m.

The play is not "just another song and dance" about racism. Using humor, music and scenes from students' lives at UMass, the play explores the complexities of the issue. Color Traps asks such provocative questions as "Do white people have rhythm?" "Are there big cities in Africa?"; "Are Asians genetically superior in math?" : "Is Spuds Mackenzie a racist dog?" and "where do people get these crazy ideas from anyway?"

Students and faculty will be available following the performance to talk with audience members about the play, and issues that it may raise.

There will be a further performance of the play this Thursday at 4:30 p.m. in the main lobby of Whitmore.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE By JEANE DIXON

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You find it easier to communicate now. Put your personal interests ahead of business for a change. Group activities help you reach some of your goals. You attract a new and influential audience.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A new trend in your personal relationships boosts your spirits. The future looks much brighter. A relatively stress-free period helps you sort out your priorities. Go after what you want!

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Get things moving forward by making the first move yourself. Business keeps you busy, even beyond quitting time. Work projects must be completed on schedule. If necessary, ask co-workers for assistance.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Enjoy your time in the spotlight. It will be good for both you and business. Use your leadership skills to straighten out a family matter. Romance is highlighted. Go for it!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Small purchases will help cement a relationship. Stay in touch with someone who played a special role in your life. Open new lines of communication with others in your workplace. You need allies!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A business partnership needs rejuvenation. You better take the first step. Computers begin to play a more important role in your life – and in your eventual success. Welcome technological advances.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You can move forward quickly now that you have eliminated doubts that clouded your decision-making abilities. Explore travel opportunities. Those at a distance will be impressed by what you have to offer.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You run the risk of upsetting others with your enthusiasm for faraway sights and sounds. Your energy and experience open many doors for you. Collaborative ventures do great.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You find practical applications for your inspirational ideas. Many people benefit. Postpone travel and concentrate on a special project. Look for ways to help an associate.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Think of what you have achieved, not of past disappointments. Clarity a situation before it becomes agonizing for both you and your partner. Check bills for possible errors before paying them.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You can correct mistakes if you move quickly. Taking certain risks is necessary to move forward. Good luck will favor you in many ways.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You can take a giant step forward in a relationship by just showing more patience and affection. Travel and romantic opportunities capture your attention. Keep a close eye on details at work.

hold true to form and do something totally off the wall. That's a chance you have to take when you're dealing with a bureaucracy such as this one. Like the MIAA here in the Bay State, they tend to stare with tunnel-vision at the bottom line, or how much greenbacks they can get.

Looking at potential first-round opponents, the Gorillas will more than likely play someone low in the tournament seedings. If they get the fifth seed, they will most likely play the automatic bid from the West region, which right now looks to be a battle between Michigan State and Notre Dame, with Whittier (Calif.) as a darkhorse.

Wouldn't that be someone then, if UMass were to host Notre Dame? Past history has shown that these teams are nowhere near the calibre of the rest of the field (last year, Loyola beat Air Force, 19-8 — not really a playoff type game, is it), and the mere thought of UMass rolling over any Fighting Irish team might be a fantasy come true for some people.

But UMass can't forget it'd postseason history. Since the tournament's inception in 1971, the Gorillas have made it seven times, including the last three seasons, but are just 1-7 with the only win coming over New Hampshire here in 1986.

KC Jones at center of Hall of Fame festivities

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP)—K.C. Jones, who played and coached on championship teams with the Boston Celtics, Lenny Wilkens, who spent 15 seasons in the NBA, and William "Pop" Gates, a pioneer of professional basketball, are scheduled to be inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame today.

Jones played nine seasons, including eight NBA championship teams, for the Celtics and then coached Boston to the 1984 and 1986 championships. He stepped down as Celtics coach following the 1987-88 season. Jones played on consecutive NCAA championship teams, along with Celtics teammate Bill Russell, at the University of San Francisco in 1955 and 1956.

Wilkens, currently the coach of the Cleveland Cavaliers, led the Seattle SuperSonics to the NBA championship in 1979. zHe graduated from Providence College in 1960, and went on to average 16.5 points a game during an NBA career with St. Louis, Seattle, Portland and Cleveland.

Gates, 71, turned professional after leading Benjamin Franklin High School to the 1938 New York City championship. He was a member of the 1939 New York Rens, which won 68 straight games and the world professional championships in Chicago. Gates was the only player to appear in all 10 world professional basketball tournaments made up of barnstorming teams.

Gates went on to a successful career as a player and coach in the old National League and American League. As player-coach, he led the Scranton Minors to the American League championship in 1950, before winding up his career as player-coach of the Harlem Globetrotters in 1955.

Several collegiate awards were scheduled to be presented during the awards banquet at the Springfield Civic Center.

Sean Elliot, a two-time All-America and the all-time leading scorer in the Pac 10, was to receive the Joe Lapchick Trophy, sponsored by St. Johns University in memory of the late coach.

The Francis Pomeroy Naismith Award, given to the nation's most outstanding senior woman collegian under 5-foot-6 and male player under 6 feet, will also be presented at the luncheon.

The women's honor will be received by Paulette Backstrom, a 5-foot-3 guard at Bowling Green State. She lead the MAC Conference for the past two seasons in assists with a 7.3 average. She was voted the most outstanding player in the 1989 MAC Tournament, averaging 17.5 points, 9 assists and 6 rebounds in two games.

Tim Hardaway, 5-11, from the University of Texas-El Paso, will receive the men's honor. Hardaway became the first UTEP player to be named Western Athletic Conference Player of the Year. He is the Minors' all-time scoring leader with 1,586 points in 124 games.

The John W. Bunn Award, named for one of the founders of the Basketball Hall of Fame and given to a person who has made outstanding contributions to basketball and sports in general, will go to George E. Killian.

UMass takes opposite positions on diamond

• Softball shoots for NCAA berth

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

UMass wants to go to the NCAA's. To do so, it needs to impress the judges enough in this final week of action to earn an at-large invitation.

In essence, then, the playoffs begin today. Here and now. The Atlantic 10 tournament kicks off this Friday at Rutgers, but in the minds of the University of Massachusetts softball team, the final two games of the regular season, to be staged this afternoon against Adelphi on Totman field (3 p.m.), are part of the playoff scene.

"These games are tremendously significant," understated UMass coach Elaine Sortino. "We can't leave them (the NCAA selection committee) with any doubts in their minds, we've just got to beat 'em."

Adelphi has been ranked as high as second in the Northeast region; UMass third. They'll both be somewhere around the top five when the latest rankings are announced this morning. The no. 1 ranked team at season's end gets one of those automatic type bids, and after that, it's all brownie points.

Wins today, and at the A-10's (where they'll face a couple more top-ranked teams in Temple and Rutgers) would go a long way towards helping the Minutewomen reach their post season goal.

"It's coming down to the last week of the season, and we're right where we wanted to be," said Sortino.

UMass faced Adelphi in foreign territory in mid-April and came away on the losing end of a 5-1 score, as hurler Chris Gage plowed through the Minutewomen untouched except for a shaky first defensive frame. At that time, the loss dropped the Minutewomen to four games under .500, extended their losing streak to three games, and threatened to push them out of the playoff picture.

Since then however, UMass has been hot, winning 21 of its last 24 to elbow its way back to within striking distance. Most recently, the Minutewomen took three of four contests on the road at Rutgers and St. Joseph's this past weekend.

"They're tired," Sortino said of her troops, "but they're going to do what they need to do. They're a tough minded group.

"We've been under a lot of pressure, and playing well against good teams, under the microscope," described Sortino.

Adelphi was in action over the weekend as well, splitting a doubleheader with the University of Rhode Island 4-3, 4-2. Its overall record now stands at 25-18, 20-8 against Northeast regional teams.

Gage has pitched on from where she left off in April, racking up a 18-9 record while protecting a 0.71 earned run average (Gage has allowed just 16 earned runs all season). She's a pretty good bet to throw both ends of today's doubleheader.

Second baseman Doreen Lumbra leads the team offensively with a .300 average.

• Baseball "sets tone for next year"

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

For the numerous freshmen on the University of Massachusetts baseball team, the past month had to be a very frustrating time.

To join a New England championship team that finished second in its conference last season, and find yourself with a 17-25 record after 42 games and no chance of making the playoffs has to be very disappointing indeed.

But mercifully, the Minutemen have only three games remaining, starting with a 1 p.m. doubleheader against Northeastern University today at Lorden Field.

The UMass baseball team will play a doubleheader with Northeastern at Lorden Field today.

But according to UMass assistant coach Bob Rikeman, the freshmen are not dwelling on their past, but looking ahead.

"They want to make a statement," Rikeman said. "They want to set the tone for next year and let people know they're ready to come back and play next year."

Both of today's scheduled starting pitchers are new to the Minutemen this year.

Brian Conroy, a junior transfer from Northeastern, will start against his old teammates in the first game. In 11 appearances, the righthander has a 3-4 record and a 4.02 earned run average.

Dan O'Leary, a freshman lefty, is scheduled to get his first start of the season in the second game. O'Leary is 1-1 with a 7.13 ERA.

Offensively, freshman catcher Lou Olivieri leads the team with a .357 average and senior Drew Seccafico is second at .352. Freshman centerfielder Brian Bright leads UMass with seven home runs, and Seccafico has driven in 32 runs.

"Some of the freshmen have been doing real well," Rikeman said. Brian Bright, Derek Dana and [sophomore] Dave Edwards have all played well. But some of the seniors have been just playing out their time."

Northeastern has no playoff hopes, either, coming into the game with a 16-20-1 record.

Northeastern is led offensively by a quartet of sophomores. Infielder John Carelli leads the team at .357, followed by

Gorillas "drop" in poll, tournament announced Sunday

After Saturday's loss to Syracuse, UMass fell into a tie for sixth with Maryland in the USILA poll.

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Just when we thought we had this whole poll thing down to a science.

The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team entered last week as the sixth-ranked team in the United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse poll. And despite the fact that the Gorillas slumbered through an 11-7 win over Boston College Tuesday night in Chestnut Hill, UMass wasn't expected to drop.

Especially after the Gorillas sent the Orangemen of Syracuse University back to upstate New York late Saturday with a huge load in their pants, people were saying that they could even move up in the poll.

Well, proving that the picking of these things has no concrete set of guidelines, those responsible for this week's Top 15 list weighed everything, thought carefully and came up with a rational decision. The result is that UMass "dropped" from sole possession of sixth to a tie for sixth.

Maryland, which has a sterling 9-6 win over Cortland State to its credit for the week, lifted itself into a tie with the Gorillas. The Terrapins had been in fourth just a week ago before losing to Duke in the Atlantic Coast Conference tournament. After dropping to seventh last week, Maryland beats a not-so-superior Cortland team.

To make matters even more confusing, the Baltimore Sun, which conducts its own lax poll every week has UMass in fourth place, or one spot up from last week.

This only shows that picking a poll is about as exact a system as pulling names out of a hat. And it really is nothing but a barometer for argument — like this one — because in the end, as UMass coach Dick Garber has been saying all season, "the polls mean nothing."

As far as playoffs are concerned, the only decision that matters is the one made by the NCAA selection committee next Sunday. They will ultimately decide where to seed who for this year's postseason party.

As a leftover thought from this weekend, Syracuse has jumped to the top of the poll after Johns Hopkins, which had been number one, lost a double-overtime clash with Towson State, 9-8. Which can only leave Gorilla players, coaches and fans alike wondering where UMass would be had it beaten Syracuse.

But of course, none of that matters. Next Sunday is what does.

So UMass shouldn't worry. Barring a scandal or some really outrageous upsets, the Gorillas will be seeded at least in the top eight and will play their first game at home. That's the common sense approach. But then again, common sense isn't something the NCAA deals with on a regular basis.

If they are seeded five through eight, the Gorillas will host someone next Wednesday, and if they manage to sneak into the top four, they will get a first-round bye and wait until Saturday before hosting.

However, there is always the possibility the NCAA will

Winds blow New England crew teams off course

Races halted over weekend; but not before women win N.E. title

C.J. ABATI
Collegian Correspondent

Due to harsh winds this weekend, the New England Championships, held in Worcester, were unable to be completed. About half of the races were run Saturday morning, before being forced to stop around midday.

The races were rescheduled for Sunday, but again harsh winds forced a cancellation. "The wind was so strong, that some of the boats were actally blown off the course," UMass coach Dave Trond said.

Despite the calls from mother nature, some very important races concerning the University of Massachusetts were finished.

The women's varsity eight, with no surprises to anyone in the boat, was crowned New England Champs. Throughout the season, the women sailed through their opponents as if they didn't exist. The same thing happened in the championships, by literally crushing the field. Their closest opponent was Wesleyan, and to say that is a gift. There was nothing but open water between the two boats.

"We've been expecting this victory all season, and they'll be our big guns at the Nationals in Philly," says Trond.

There were two other finals that UMass had boats entered in, the men's novice and lightweight eights. The novice-eight had a really good row. "They were fourth with 500 yards to go, and finished up with a really good sprint," Trond said.

They finished second behind the Coast Guard Academy. "I was really pleased with this boat, they blew past teams that had beaten them before, especially WPI."

Unfortunately, there was one upset for UMass. The lightweight crew finished last in their event. "They just didn't row well. It was more of a mental problem than anything else," Trond said.

"The weather was terrible, but that didn't make a difference because everybody else was in the same position," Trond said.

Tufts University won the race, followed by Coast Guard, the University of Rhode Island and finally UMass. Hopefully, they can bounce back and do well in the Nationals.

The other crews on the UMass squad, did well in their heats, but had their finals cancelled. The men's varsity heavyweights cruised through their heats, coming in first. It was their debut as a four, and first victory of the year.

Because the bad weather forced the cancellation of several races, all UMass boats will head to Philadelphia for the Nationals. The races will take place on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. The women's eight, and if they can get back on track, the men's lightweight eight, should be the strong boats for UMass.

Globe columnist to speak today at CC

Will McDonough, National Football League columnist for the Boston Globe, will speak today on "Sports Writing" at 1 p.m. in Campus Center rooms 174-176.

Also, Carl Hirsh from Spectacor of Philadelphia will speak tomorrow on "Facilities Management". That seminar will begin at 1:25 p.m. and will also be in CC 174-176.

Both seminars are sponsored by the Department of Sport Studies. For more information call 545-0441.

Mill River, where the body of UMass student Paul W. Ryan was found yesterday.

Student's body found by uncle in river

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

The body of University of Massachusetts junior Paul W. Ryan was found yesterday at 11 a.m., 200 yards downstream from the Puffers Pond dam where rescue teams had been searching since Monday, Amherst police said yesterday.

Ryan had been missing since Saturday when he and David Lennon, a UMass alumnus and resident of Amherst, were swimming in the Amherst pond.

Lennon went over the falls at the west end of the pond, and was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton with a fractured pelvis and internal injuries, but Ryan could not be found. Some relatives said they believe Ryan died attempting to save his friend.

Ryan, 22, was found west of the dam under a submerged log in the Mill River by his uncle, according to Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia.

The area had been covered several times previously, but because of poor light conditions, Ryan was not seen. What alerted the uncle to Ryan's position was the sun gleaming off Ryan's white shorts, Maia said.

Ryan was identified at the scene and medical examiners from Springfield were summoned, police said.

The cause of death is listed as accidental drowning, a spokesman for the examiner's office said.

Ryan was a landscape architecture and regional planning major from Lowell who lived in Mackimmie Residential Hall in the Southwest Residential Area.

His aunt described him as a man who had "millions of friends" and who would always help those around him. "[Paul was] loving, caring, gentle, witty. Just a beautiful kid that's all . . . special, very special," she said choking back tears.

Ryan graduated from Lowell High School and then came to UMass to pursue his landscaping major, she said.

During the summers Ryan worked on Cape Cod building houses, she said.

"Paul was very outgoing, very loving, very gentle and full of fun. He just loved life, he wouldn't hurt a flea. Everybody loved Paul, everybody," she said.

Another aunt, Mary Ryan, said, "He was such a very enjoyable person to be with and always lifted the hearts of people."

Ryan is survived by his brother William, his parents, Bart and Joan Ryan, and several other relatives.

500 attend forum on military research

Afterwards, 30 occupy building

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

More than 500 people attended a forum at Mahar Auditorium to discuss the pros and cons of military-funded research at the University of Massachusetts.

"They are doing work for the Army, and the Army's business is to kill," Wally Nelson, 80, said. "In my opinion, they are using the wrong language."

[As the forum wrapped up, about 30 protesters left Mahar and took over Memorial Hall again.]

The six-member panel spoke for an hour before questions were heard from the audience. Many people from the audience said if the Defense Department is funding research then they must be interested in using that research for war.

Students push for ASL as a second language

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Mart Boulerice and his younger brother both attend the University of Massachusetts. So did their parents. But Mart said his other brother, Colin, will not even consider coming here when he graduates from high school.

"English was my first language and American Sign Language was my second," said Boulerice, whose brother is completely deaf. "For [Colin], American Sign was his first language while English was his second."

Boulerice, a senior English major, has organized an effort to urge the University to establish a more extensive curriculum in American Sign Language (ASL), which would satisfy the language requirement.

Boulerice said the University's reluctance to recognize this, the nation's third most commonly used language, arises from a common misunderstanding about ASL. He

8 arrested in Duffey's office

By ANTHONY PADOVANO
Collegian Staff

Eight people including two University of Massachusetts students were arrested last night in the Whitmore Administration building by University police for trespassing after hours in the building.

The people arrested had been sitting-in in Chancellor Joseph Duffey's outer reception area since early in the afternoon because "they were concerned about [Department of Defense] funding and concerned about the discipline procedure," imposed on students who were arrested last Thursday, said Jeanne Hopkins, University spokeswoman.

[Over the past two weeks, more than 80 students have been arrested for trespassing in various buildings while they were protesting unclassified military research being conducted at the University.]

Last Thursday, 19 students were arrested by police then suspended from the University following the occupation of an office in the Graduate Research Center. Those arrested last night were protesting the University's implementation of interim sanctions on those 19 students, which allowed the University to suspend those students without a hearing. Suspended students can appeal.

According to Hopkins, nine of the suspensions have been lifted while 10 remained in place.

Those arrested were transported to the Hampshire

LBGA, allies 'speak-out' on attacks

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

For 90 minutes yesterday afternoon, about 300 lesbian, bisexual and gay students said they felt secure at the University of Massachusetts, as they and their "allies" spoke out against campus homophobia.

The students, joined by several faculty and staff, rallied because "we're not going to cower in the corner of the fourth floor of the Student Union," according to Mark Atkocaitis, co-president-elect of the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance.

Departing LBGA president Billy Curtis said recently that the noon speak-out was prompted by the return of part of the alliance's banner last week.

The banner, decorated with a charging lavender rhinoceros symbolizing the lesbian, bisexual and gay civil rights movement, hung from the second floor of the Student Union for three months before it was stolen in February.

Last Tuesday, a wrinkled white envelope addressed to the LBGA arrived at their office, Curtis said. The envelope contained only the rhinoceros' head, with a simulated bullet hole punched through its brow, he said. The hole was outlined with red marker, apparently signifying blood.

"This rally is directed to people responsible for provoking this harassment," Atkocaitis said. "No matter what gender, race, religion or sexual orientation you are, (we) won't tolerate any harassment at UMass."

A statement from Chancellor Joseph Duffey was read at the speak-out by Ben Eder, an LBGA member. Duffey said UMass is not one community, but a collection of communities that must learn from each other.

"Most people have some difficulty — at one time or another — appreciating what may be unfamiliar to them," the statement read. "Yet a social mosaic like ours requires — even encourages — interacting with a broad spectrum of people, their values and their life styles."

Adam Stein (above), speaking to onlookers at an LBGA rally on the Student Union steps yesterday.

Felice Yeskel, coordinator of the program for gay, lesbian and bisexual concerns, said it was "wonderful the chancellor decided to speak out and show administrative leadership," though she said some students said the statement, made a week after the initial incident, should have been delivered sooner.

Linda Marchesani, a member of the faculty and staff group for gay, lesbian and bisexual concerns agreed the administration, along with other "allies" have an important role "so we can take action against harassment of any group."

The protesters held signs reading "Homophobia is UNCOOL," "Love is love" and "Fight back," and circulated a petition calling for the creation of courses on the history of gay people and issues regarding the gay community. According to one student, 350 people signed the petitions, which asked that such courses fulfill "general education requirements in order to insure enrollment."

Ralliers also became verbally combative with a member of the Republican Club, as he waved an American flag and recited the Pledge of Allegiance.

Ted Maravelias, president of the club, began to recite the Pledge, but was drowned out by several other students who stressed the word "all" in "liberty and justice for all."

Maravelias said he wanted students to realize that there was an "alternative to their lifestyle . . . to homosexuality."

"[The Republican Club] believes it represents the mainstream views of the country, and of UMass," he said. "Our views are biblically based, and based on the foundations of our society. Homosexuals have rights based on

Driving a PVTA bus has its ups and downs

By AL KAUFMAN

Ninth in a 10-part series on life at the University of Massachusetts

At one time or another, we all have experienced a Pioneer Valley Transit Authority bus ride. Sometimes, it's a pleasant ride on a half-filled bus that gets you where you want to go on time. Other times it's a ride from hell.

For student bus drivers, the experiences can be similarly good or bad. Preston Huckabee, a University of Massachusetts sophomore and civil engineering major, was a bus driver for PVTA last semester, driving the five-college route Friday nights.

He said he enjoyed his passengers. "The people were usually friendly. They'd come up and talk to me," Huckabee said. "And the ride is really relaxing when you get out of Amherst."

What Huckabee did not like about his job, and the reason he quit, was the administration.

"They're really strict with the treatment of buses and drivers almost to the point of Big Brother watching over your shoulder," he said, adding that because UMass leases the buses, they are responsible for everything that happens to them, "including the littlest scratches, and they pass that responsibility down to the drivers."

Huckabee also said he did not like that if a driver got a class two license (required to drive the bus) through PVTA, that driver was required to work for two semesters. If the driver does not do that, he or she must reimburse PVTA for the training. "I didn't get my class two through them, so I could quit after one semester," Huckabee said. "But if I did get it through them, I would have had to pay them $100 for leaving a semester early. People who go through the training and decide they don't want the job have to pay $200."

Shaun Darragh, a UMass senior mass communications major and PVTA bus driver for almost a year now, said he has had no trouble with the administration.

"Drivers don't have too much contact with the administration," he said, adding that the people he did come in contact with he liked.

Unlike Huckabee, Darragh said he is not fond of college passengers. "People in the Amherst area, especially on the campus shuttle, are (asses)," he said. "They're just annoying. They do things like [not ringing] for a stop and get [upset] when you don't stop, or they start complaining if you're late."

But Darragh did say he liked people outside of the college area. "The people in the outreach routes [Belchertown and South Deerfield] are really nice. They're friendly and and really appreciate having any free bus service at all," he said.

Both Huckabee and Darragh said they chose the job because they feel it is one of the best-paying jobs in the area and the hours are flexible. "Like any other job, it has its ups and downs," said Darragh. "But . . . I like it."

Students, faculty outraged by eviction

Bookshop, other stores get the boot from building

Collegian Staff Report

The thought of Goliard Bookshop disappearing from its Amherst home has provoked anger and sorrow among area college students and professors. The bookshop and two other stores are scheduled to close later this month.

The bookshop, Ritz Camera Shop, and Collective Copies all received eviction notices last month after their building was bought by Peter P. Grandonico, an Amherst real estate agent, according to the Springfield Union-News. The three stores are scheduled to be replaced by more upscale stores, the newspaper reported.

"Many books are here for sale on a daily basis," said Guy Spencer, co-owner of Goliard Bookshop. "Many books are here for the individuals who request a rare title."

Spencer said the upscale shops are better able to afford high rents. If Goliard Bookshop is replaced by another bookshop, that store would most likely be a chain, he said.

"Stocking priorities become more based on thoroughness and depth, which lessens the distinction between books in Amherst and in the malls," he said.

Letters decrying the ousting of the bookshop are being circulated to local newspapers and to Grandonico, according to Sura Levine, an art history professor at Hampshire College. "Amherst has extraordinary resources in its bookstores," she said. "To lose one of them diminishes the scope of Amherst as a cultural center of bookstores."

No one from Ritz Camera could be reached for comment.

Carol MacColl, one of several owners of Collective Copies said the owners were shocked when they given only 30 days to move out. "We're concerned with rents getting prohibitively high," she said. "It seems [Grandonico] is more interested in Benetton-type stores and we feel there should be a diversity of stores in the downtown."

Grandonico could not be reached for comment.

Cyclist to cross country for lung association

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

When University of Massachusetts music major Michael McKendry tours the United States this summer, fans will sing to the tune of an unusual instrument — his bicycle.

McKendry, a freshman, is one of 400 cyclists participating in the American Lung Association's 1989 TransAmerica Bicycle-Trek, which is scheduled to run from June 5 to July 21.

The cyclists, who are expected to raise a minimum of $5,000 each to benefit ALA, begin their journey in Seattle, Washington and plan to cover 3,359 miles before they reach their destination in Atlantic City, New Jersey.

"Actually, this is all a big hoax," McKendry said jokingly. "When we get to Atlantic City, we're going to take all the money we raised and spend it."

Pushing their healthy lungs for those who can't, the trekkers said they expect to complete their trip in 47 days. With a diverse itinerary spanning 12 states, the bikers will cross mountain ranges and prairies, breathing city smog and fresh farm air alike. Planned stopover sites vary from the urban areas of Milwaukee and Chicago to the less populated Baraboo, Wisconsin and Delphi, Indiana.

McKendry, who said he prefers pedaling through the small towns, added that he is looking forward to visiting one in particular: "warm and friendly" Makoti, North Dakota — population 150.

"The whole town shows up to cheer us on," he said. "Three times as many bikers [as the town's population] will pass through."

The finish line is the only image he savors more than Makoti. "On the last day, we all will congregate 10 miles outside of Atlantic City," he said. "A swarm of bicyclists will flood the Boardwalk."

McKendry, who has dreamed of biking across the country since age 16, said that he heard about the ALA trip on a radio talk show last summer. "It's the only thing I knew I really wanted to do," he said.

Most trekkers, said McKendry, want to bike across the country anyway — the fact that it is for a worthy cause is an added bonus. "The Lung Association is simply playing off the motivation of the trekkers," he said.

To train for the trip, McKendry has been logging 125 miles a week. He frequently tests himself on a one-mile hill at Mt. Sugarloaf Reservation in Sunderland.

The TransAmerica Bicycle-Trek has been an obsession, McKendry said, "permeating" everything he does. "I've been a lot more serious lately," he said. "I've joked around less with friends because I'm always thinking about this."

"It is not the question of whether I can ride 80 miles a day or raise $5,000 . . . even though those are my immediate goals," McKendry said. "It's a much deeper question."

McKendry added that the trip will be one of self-discovery, a time to see how he responds to challenges.

So far McKendry's most formidable challenge has been the fundraising. He has sent out form letters asking for donations to friends, relatives, and "people in [his] parents' address book." "Basically, everyone I've ever met in my life has been sent a letter," McKendry said.

"With so many people supporting me and backing me, I'll put my own money on the line if I come up short [of the minimum $5,000 needed to participate]," he said.

Contributions can be sent to TransAmerica Bicycle-Trek, c/o Michael McKendry, 6 Parmenter Avenue, Maynard, MA 01754. Checks should be made out to the American Lung Association.

the Constitution, but they have to pay the price for their illegal, promiscuous acts."

Maravelias, who said he was the lone club representative at the rally, said in spite of the gay community's "sinful" behavior, the people who destroyed the LBGA banner are equally "sinful," and the act should not be tolerated.

Yeskel said she could appreciate Maravelias' responsibility in defending his beliefs. Others, including those responsible for damaging the banner, promoted "anonymous hate," she said.

"We came together to say the community norm is to tolerate all peoples and not to harass," she said, adding that she hopes the "positive atmosphere here . . . will have a ripple effect" leading to more tolerance of gay students.

Rally, Protest, Strike

Compared to the '60s when students closed universities, today's student activism is dead — sort of

By ANTHONY PADOVANO
Collegian Staff

University students surround a bus loaded with 35 protestors of military research last Thursday on North Pleasant St.

The recent arrests of more than 80 demonstrators protesting military research at the University is reminiscent, on a smaller scale, of the student protests of the late 1960s and early 1970s.

As America entered the 1970s, the country was being wracked by social unrest, led by students, stemming from US involvement in the Vietnam War.

Then, like today, student protests made for good headlines. Hardly a month would pass in that period without some kind of student protest being splashed on the front page.

As a result of all that attention, when most people think about student activism, they think of it beginning in the '60s. But in truth, student activists have been around almost as long as the system in which they matriculate.

As far back as 1870, when two students from Massachusetts Agricultural College [eventually named the University of Massachusetts] led a successful student strike to end required manual labor for students, students have been involved in activism.

Ever since, with only a few exceptions, there has been record of various student protests with varying amounts of participation at UMass.

In 1934, students at Massachusetts State College marched for world peace and disarmament up Pleasant St. in Amherst, and in March of 1964, several thousand UMass students rallied to protest the administrative denial of the traditional day off for spring.

"Like everything else at Universities, student activism moves in waves, just like light and water. the high tide was in 1970, but it started going downhill soon afterward," said Carl Davidson, a Students for a Democratic Society national officer from 1966-1968, in a recent telephone interview. SDS was the largest student organization in American history.

> "It's priorities. That students are here to get an education is the number one priority . . . The idea of rallying and screaming for a cause is foreign, (students) just don't feel comfortable."
> – W. Greg Rothman

The high point in 1970 Davidson was talking about happened after May 4th, when nervous National Guardsmen at Kent State University fired into a crowd of students protesting US involvement in Southeast Asia. The four students who were killed became the rallying point for student activists from coast to coast and immediately led to a nation-wide student strike which brought the country's educational system to a grinding halt.

But it seems the massive student protests of the '60s and '70s were an anomaly and were doomed to live a striking but short life. Soon after the strike, the energy and fervor of student activism began a slow decline, occasionally sprouting up in events like the anti-CIA protests in 1986, but never lasting for an extended period. Today, most student protest organizers around the country say they have been successful if more than 200 people show up to support a cause.

The status of student activism depends on who you talk to.

Dead or Alive?

Colleen Fink, a senior journalism/psychology major as well as senior editor for the Daily Targum at Rutgers University, said "Apathy levels at Rutgers are obscenely high. . . . People who [attend Rutgers] are most interested in making money when they graduate. They come here to learn what they have to and leave."

Eric Beasley, a senior political science/Pan-African major and a member of the Black United Students organization at Kent State University, said "The numbers of students involved are small ... students don't become involved until it affects them directly."

On the other side of the fence, W. Greg Rothman, noted campus activist as well as the recipient of the 1987 College Republican and Students For America Activist of the Year Awards, said "The fact that there are so many active political organizations on both sides shows activism isn't dead."

Geoffrey Zoeller, a junior biochemistry/music major who is also the vice president of Public Affairs for the Rutgers Governing Association said "Activism was dead for a long time, but more and more people know about [issues that affect them]. The downward swing [in student activism] is beginning to reverse itself. It's a slow process. but I think it is changing.

It's hard to tell which of the two groups has the proper perspective.

The fact is that students still do rally, protest and strike, but not on the scale of the '60s and '70s. But those who say activism is alive seem to accept, and expect, less from students.

At UMass, a recent rally to protest cuts in the state's education budget drew more than 150 students to the steps of the Student Union building. A letter campaign protesting the cuts sent 1,500 letters to legislators and a trip to the statehouse attracted 100 students. The campaign was considered a success.

During a similar coordinated protest in April of 1975, 1,500 UMass students rallied on the Boston Common and 11,000 students signed a petition protesting the cuts.

Compared to the student movement of the '60s and '70s, student activism is dead, but "To say the student movement is dead is to say that it is nonexistent, which it isn't. ... The movement of the '60s was unique. Since the '20s and the '30s, with the exception of 1940 - 1955, there has always been a student movement, though usually small," said Gabe Gabrielski, scholar in residence at the Western Gateway Heritage Park in North Adams and a participant of the '60s movement

"A lot of the social forces that helped generate a student movement in the '60s are just not here," he continued. "[Today] there exists a feeling 'If I just keep my place things will change.' That wasn't the case in the '60s. . . . The organizational infrastructure [for united protest] does not exist today. It's hard to figure out where to join up."

Davidson said students are not as active because of economics.

"When I was in college at Penn State, it only cost me about $1,500 a year so I could afford to screw around for a couple of years. With college education costing what it does today, you can't afford to screw around for a couple of years because you're up to your ears in debt," he said.

Differences between '60s and '70s and the '80s

According to Davidson, one reason activism swept across the country like a tidal wave in the '60's and '70s was because students were being directly affected by national and international issues. He said when students graduated from college they faced being sent to Vietnam; they saw people of color being beaten up for their color; administrators were acting in the place of parents; and universities were working in connection with the military to kill people on the other side of the planet.

Another reason the movement caught on was because there was a national body directing the movement towards clearly defined goals, goals such as the abolition of the draft, civil rights for minorities and abolition of in loco parentis [in absence of parents] policies.

As soon as changes were made, activism began to subside.

"A lot of the issues that mobilized students around in loco parentis were abandoned," continued Gabrielski, "As far as the civil rights movement, by 1973 segregation by law had been broken. . . . The war was winding down and the war was a great source of energy for students. When the draft was ended, it took the wind right out of the anti-war movement."

According to those interviewed, the major issues facing the country and students today are abortion, environmental issues, homelessness, South African investment and political and economic issues, all of which are things that do not directly affect most students.

Said Rothman: "Most students will say [about protests] 'Big deal. If it does not affect me or my roommate, I'm not going to get involved.'"

Marklein echoed Rothman. "People may support these issues but they don't have enough time between classes and other things" to get out and actively protest, he said.

John Hutchins, a junior engineering major at UMass, said there are things he supports, such as environmental issues and abortion, but there are not many things that he would go out of his way to protest.

Ben, a Jewish economics junior who did not want his last name used, said there are some things he would actively protest, such as the Klu Klux Klan or the neo-nazi party, but he won't normaly make an effort to get out and protest.

But according to Rothman, the reason activism is widespread is not because of apathy.

"It's priorities. That students are here to get an education is the number one priority. . . . The idea of rallying and screaming for a cause is foreign, they just don't feel comfortable," he said.

He added that a small number of vocal students, like the Republican Club on campus, can create a lot of interest and controversy, sometimes more than a large and quiet group.

> "It's inevitable a new student movement will arise. I don't know where, when, how or why, but students will be involved because of their youth, idealism and strength."
> –Gabe Gabrielski

Robert Lash, a freshman labor relations major and student senator at Rutgers University, agrees with Rothman. "Quantity is not as important as quality," he said, "You can have a relatively small but vocal group who can claim representation for the rest of the student population and you can achieve a lot with that. As a matter of fact, a small group can be better than a large group," because a better working relationship with administrators can be developed.

"There is active support and passive support. There isn't overwhelming active support but there is a lot of passive support" as witnessed by large turnouts in student government elections, he said.

Davidson agreed. "Students are still finding ways to get involved in progressive politics," he said. "They are getting more into electoral politics, in student government and general elections, by way of the Rainbow Coalition, the women's movement, etc."

[UMass student government elections in March had the largest voter turnout of the 80s.]

Minority Organization

All the students interviewed agreed that in order to get students active, an issue has to affect them directly. This may be the reason most agree minority groups seem to be more united and vocal in their protests than any other group.

County Jail. Hopkins said those arrested would probably be arraigned tomorrow in Hampshire District Court.

[After the arrests, about 30 students, who were attending a forum last night in Mahar Auditorium about military research on campus, left the forum to occupy Memorial Hall when they heard the arrests were made. Details were unavailable until today.]

Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson had no comment on the arrests or the sit-in.

Police, some wearing police-issued riot gear and others not, carried seven of the protesters through the loading dock entrance at approximately 9:15 p.m. on the West side of the building and into at least three police cruisers parked in lot 71. The eighth protester, Margaret Holt who is in her 70s, was wheeled out of the building in a wheelchair and helped into a police car.

Hopkins said the protesters were arrested at about 6:30 p.m. Police spent the almost three hours between the arrests and the removal of the protesters booking them and processing the initial paperwork. Hopkins said booking the suspects at the scene is being implemented as standard procedure by University police.

The two students arrested were Sue Gordon, chairwoman of the Board of Governors finance committee, and Andrew Sirulnik, one of the suspended students. The other six people arrested, though not fully identified by press time, are members of local communities. The arrests of the protesters were watched by a group of as many as 10 impartial observers, chosen by the University.

Castillon vows organized fight against budget cuts

By TOM CIAMPI
Collegian Staff

Catalina Castillon, the newly-elected president of the Graduate Student Senate, has declared she is ready to roll up her sleeves and work to protect the University of Massachusetts from further state budget cuts.

Castillon, a graduate student teaching assistant in the Spanish and Portuguese Department, said she will utilize many strategies to fight the cuts, ranging from urging students' parents to contact their state representatives to hiring someone to research the politics of the higher education system.

"We can organize ourselves at parents' weekends to inform parents of the effects of the budget cuts," she said.

During such weekends, she said graduate students could organize a "half-hour information meeting" to ask parents to phone or write state legislators in protest of the cutbacks.

Castillon said hiring a researcher to investigate state and campus education policies would enable students to plot the most successful strategy toward fighting the cuts.

A TA for two years, she is also an elected graduate representative for the UMass Arts Council and is a member of her department's International Programs Committee. She helped organize last year's two-day "No Business As Usual" moratorium, when TAs suspended their classes and urged students to attend ad-hoc educational workshops about sexism and racism.

Castillon, who defeated opponent Marc Kenen two weeks ago for the presidential seat, ran a progressive campaign which included fighting racism, sexism and homophobia, increasing the availability of affordable housing and child care for graduate students, creating a graduate student center and lounge and regaining litigation power for the Legal Services Center.

The president-elect will take office on June 1, replacing outgoing president Gita van Heerdan, who did not seek re-election. Castillon will receive a salary of $6,700 for the one-year term, which is the average teaching assistant stipend, according to Wendy Farley, GSS staff assistant.

Castillon, who was born in Cleveland but lived in Spain until the age of 22, last year served on the Committee on the University of El Salvador. She said the committee met with that university's faculty and administration, responding to requests for educational support by not only sending books and pens, but also UMass graduate students with expertise in computers and the sciences.

Although she admits she has little experience in negotiating with administrators, Castillon said she believes that beginning with a clean slate will help her relations with the administration.

"I look forward to working with the administration. I have no animosity toward them, and they should have none toward me," she said, adding that she is optimistic about improving the predicament of graduate students on campus.

"I am an idealist," she said. "I still believe that the world can be changed a little, and if I can change things around for graduate students, I'll be satisfied."

Castillon declined to reveal her opinions concerning the recent protests of Department of Defense funding on campus and the threats of the GSS to withdraw it's financial contribution of $29,400 from the Board of Governors budget.

"I am not president yet, and I will take my position when I am in charge," she said, adding that the topics will be under discussion at upcoming senate meetings.

Castillon, who is pursuing a master of arts degree in Spanish literature, said she participated in last week's graduate student teach-out, conducting her Intermediate Spanish II classes in the courtyard of the Whitmore Administration Building.

Louis Quin, chairman of the chemistry department used an overhead projector to show that while his research is funded by the Defense Department, it is not limited to military applications.

"My research is by no means related to defense efforts alone," he said. "My research has nothing to do with the materials of warfare."

"The mobilization of militarization at American universities results in the perpetual preparedness for creating war," Michael Klare, a five-college peace and world security studies professor, said. "We must think about peace conversion and convert military institutions to peace institutions."

He said more money should be spent on AIDS research and preserving the environment. "Much less money is spent on peace resolutions than on conflict resolutions."

Following the forum in Mahar, more than 30 protesters rushed to Memorial Hall, marking the second takeover of that building in two weeks and the fourth occupation in as many weeks. The first sit-in culminated to 61 arrests.

The number of demonstrators quickly grew to 50. Supporters of the protest brought food and blankets to Memorial Hall. The protesters blockaded the entrances to the Hall with tables, chairs and boxes of computer paper.

"I think the administration is going to be a lot more reluctant to come in here and arrest us," Peter Richards, a protester said. "The group has gathered support from the faculty and community and the administration has noticed the growing support."

said most people don't understand that Amer..an Sign is "an independent, visual, gestural language and does not correlate directly with English." Unlike Braille, in which a set of raised dots represent English words, ASL is a combination of hand gestures, facial expressions and body movements, he said.

Last March, Boulerice and the University's department of communication disorders formed the Commitee to Institute American Sign Language. Boulerice drew up a petition demanding that American Sign satisfy the foreign language requirement. Yesterday, members of the committee and Theta Chi fraternity solicited signatures on the Campus Center Concourse. Boulerice said the petition now has more than 3,000 signatures, but it will be a while before the University will even consider the change.

"To make a curricular change here is like moving a mountain," he said. "It took me over a month to find out how to write a petition that was legitimate."

A survey conducted by the Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office revealed that out of 400 University students surveyed, 87 percent said ASL should satisfy the language requirement. Sixty-one percent of those surveyed said they were interested in taking a course in ASL and 44 percent indicated they were interested in taking courses up to a level of proficiency.

Sandra Lindberg of the department of communication disorders, said ASL courses are too big and do not go beyond the introductory level. There are only five interpreters for the 15 deaf or hearing impaired students on campus, she said.

Lindberg said that because the College of Arts and Sciences does not recognize ASL, these students have to be proficient in three different languages: English, ASL and one that does satisfy the requirement.

Boulerice recently testified before the Massachusetts Legislature requesting that all state colleges and universities establish classes in ASL and have those classes fulfill language requirements.

"If UMass could produce, say, 100 people a year who know sign language, it would have an incredible impact, not just on an academic level, but on society as a whole," he said.

Eric Beasley of BUS at Kent St. said the reason minorities in general and African-American students in particular are so highly organized is their problems are more acute than other groups.

"Women have problems on every college campus, but they don't have the degree of problems blacks have. . . . For black students, you can generally see what the problems are. You can be on campus for two weeks and see the problems" while it takes longer to see other groups problems. Blacks have differences between each other but they will put them aside to address the bigger problems first — like survival, he said.

His points were echoed by UMass junior communications major Kevin Mitchell, who is also the program director for WMUA.

"A movement unites common people, sometimes for culture, patriotism, honor or focus, into a bond because they have to be aligned and working in unison. We [blacks] share a common experience, a common oppression, and we can all be affected by the oppression," he said.

"By working in unison," he continued, "we get a feeling of group security."

Mitchell said some of the problems blacks must face are not having more minority students on campus, Eurocentric-based courses, stereotypical icons, white students not giving them a chance and not being respected as men.

The future of student activism

Gabrielski thinks another movement is out there somewhere. "It's inevitable a new student movement will arise. I don't know where, when, how or why, but students will be involved because of their youth, idealism and strength. Students have always been the shock troops of the movement. They might not be the intellectual force behind it but they will be the physical strength behind it because they have the time," he said.

The issue that many feel could be the rallying point for future activism could be in loco parentis policies. As the decade has progressed, the University administration has become more paternalistic.

Residence hall policies that have long gone unenforced have begun to be enforced, policies such as single-sex bathrooms and event weekend guest policies.

The president of Boston University implemented a guest policy that does not allow non-university overnight guests. The announcement of the policy sparked a numerous protests by thousands of BU students.

University officials banned the sale of cigarettes on campus because they were deemed unhealthy to students. And students who are of legal drinking age are no longer allowed to drink in public. After the drinking policy was announced, a week of protests ensued, capped by a rally of about 2,000 students outside the Student Union building.

According to Robert Lash at Rutgers, student activism "comes from a feeling that students are looked down upon, that students are second class citizens. Students don't want to be treated by the administration or the government like children. ... Empowerment gets you respect and you want to be asked for input with policy decisions that affect student life."

What lies ahead for student activism, whether it comes together into another mass movement or goes the way of the hula hoop, is as yet unclear.

Said Gabrielski, "There's a feeling 'If I just keep my place, things will change.'" It's up to students to decide if they will accept the change.

Institutionalized discomfort

Oh, where to sit?

I am never fully awake for my 8 o'clock class until I sit in this chair. You know the kind, institutional. As I walk into the room my body wants to turn back around, back to the box-spring environment it just came from.

Gayle Long

But I have to stay. The aluminium chair has a wooden desk top decorated with names of heavy metal bands on these deteriorating slabs of unfinished wood. The sitting apparatus on these putrid pieces of furniture are slippery and rigid. Every few minutes I find myself falling on the floor.

It is not as if the University contains only chairs of such an unscrupulous discomfort. There are a few escapes. The mustard yellow upholstery on the easy theatre seats in Herter Hall have a firm, supportive back. I love to sink down into them as a professor starts to babble in what sounds like Greek to me but is actually contemporary history.

Hasbrouk Laboratory's Lecture Hall 20 provides yet another pleasant reclining experience. The dim lighting plays a catamount role and the demurely painted chairs are easily conforming to individual bodies. Smart students realize that if the lecture is a boring one, they can take a nap.

Yet, a walk upstairs in the same building can be a nightmarish experience. Hasbrouk 134 has row after row of harsh, blue plastic seats that are not only are torturous to the buttocks, but the backs of these irksome pieces of furniture are not tall enough to sit in any human position. Many times I have left this auditorium feeling like the Hunchback of Notre Dame.

In Thompson Hall, the auditoriums on the ground floor are a bit more enticing. These chairs have a comfy cushion. Most lecture-goers find themselves fast asleep in a crowded hall, even if they are seated in the front row or watching a Jaques Consteau film.

One neighbor in my Oceanography class, annoyed at my ability to keep my eyes closed and take notes, slipped me a note reading, 'WAKE UP YOU —HOLE!' I guess that the fact that I was directly in front of the professor disturbed him.

The Reading Room and Cape Cod Lounge, located in the middle of campus, are nice places to relax and study. The Reading Room has a tranquil atmosphere and the box chairs which are well worn from the number of people who, despite their good intentions of studying, rest up for the remainder of the day's activities.

The Cape Cod Lounge, on the other hand, is a noisy, sunny room with a hodgepodge of couches, chairs and tables. The place has a constant stream of traffic, and by the end of the day the carpet is covered with old newspapers and popcorn boxes. But the couches have styrofoam cushions and students are known to become oblivious, aware only of their dreams when "studying."

But the best place to sleep on campus is undoubtedly Memorial Hall. The generally empty room contains expensively-upholstered firm couches that have padded arm rests. The hall is a little-known hideaway for a minority of nap connoisseurs.

During the Memorial Hall occupation, its regular nappers wandered around campus, looking as if they had just been evicted from a Park Avenue penthouse.

The majority of you must think that the main reason I go to class is to sleep. That is not entirely true. Comfort is important. Being uncomfortable causes irritability and is a literal pain in the ass.

Blah, lukewarm politics

This is the end. After a year's exchange at UMass, and a semester as Arts editor on this illustrious organ, I am bidding my goodbyes to the University of Massachusetts. It's funny, but now I can't remember what I expected before I came here; something along the lines of a university, I expect. You know, that place where you go to learn, improve your mind and your perspective on the world. Well I came, I saw, and I suppose I even learned quite a lot, but none of it was in class, and very little of it was good.

I've learned what it's like to live in a police state, with the constant flash of blue lights on the roads; some cop no doubt wondering how many underage drinkers he can pull in that night, himself intoxicated with the thought of all that juicy commission.

I've learned the futility of trying to prevent a reactionary administration from turning the university into a bomb factory, when confronted by the fascist bullyboy tactics of the authorities and the fact that the majority of "students" are walking around in the self-induced soma-coma of their own parochialism, more concerned about their stupid grades and sordid little social lives than the safety of the environment in which they live. Will it take another Kent State to make these people wake up?

Graeme Thomson

I've been depressed by the increasingly conservative attitudes and aspirations I've seen in students, the prime concerns inevitably being getting a good job, house, family, yawn! The fallacy of the American dream still exists even as the walls of US imperialism and isolationism are crumbling before the emergence of a new global consensus of Third World nations. It just kills me to watch Burning Spear singing about freeing Africa in front of a bunch of inane yuppie wanna-bes who will become part of the same corporate capitalism which deals with South Africa, and which has been screwing the developing world royally since the dawn of time.

Everywhere I've gone I've been confronted with open (and closed) racism, sexism and homophobia, all deeply-rooted problems which are either quietly brushed under the carpet, or flashily scapegoated to other things. As a good friend of mine recently pointed out, when things aren't running smoothly, the solution is invariably to take away more individual rights. Hence, from 1986 Southwest brawl, racism caused by drunkenness: solution - ban alcohol on campus! Excuse me Mr. Duffey, but to the best of my knowledge, the ingredients of a Bud do not include a couple of grams of racism. This is typical of the administration's shallow, basically uncaring attitude. Looking good is the name of the game.

I am comforted by the fact that the tide will eventually turn, and, thank God, Tracy Chapman will not be the catalyst for the revolution. Finally the ineffectual white, middle-class drippy-hippy, drug-induced sixties nostalgia haze *loveulu*tionaries are being replaced by people who realise that peaceful protest is about as useful as a chocolate teapot, that you've got to fight dirty if you want to win. Luckily, unlike Rothman and the headless chickens who make up the Republican Club, they are also blessed with intelligence.

If Rothman claims to represent the mainstream, then let him. As has been proven time and time again, "mainstream," whether it be in politics, music, art, literature - anything, sucks.

Well hey! I've said my piece and I'm happy. I'm set to go back to a University whose students actually care, a Univesity where student empowerment can bring down a dodgy administration at the drop of a hat, where the right-wing is "Universally" ridiculed. Your chancellor is Joe Schmoe Duffey, ours is Winnie Mandela. Think about it.

Anyway, even if you can't drink, have fun, and demonstrate — in fact, all the things that make being a student worthwhile, UMass will still be a "gas."

Graeme Thomson is outta here

Plausible majority support

Organizers of recent anti-military research protests seem to be having a harder time gathering support from the student masses than the demonstrators who denounced the Central Intelligence Agency two years ago.

Pedro Pereira

Anti-CIA protesters focused their anger on such CIA atrocities as waging wars in Central America and overthrowing governments throughout the world. Their demand was to halt CIA recruiting on campus, and although the administration hasn't yet complied, we haven't seen CIA recruiters since November 1987.

The anti-CIA group succeeded in persuading a good number of students and a trial jury that the agency's waging wars in Third World countries behind the American public's back is unacceptable behavior for a democratic society.

Although the student population seemed to be evenly divided on the question of barring CIA recruiters, getting about half of the students to support the ban is a respectable accomplishment.

Furthermore, banning CIA recruiters was a concrete, realistic goal, as opposed to the extensive lists of demands the anti-Department of Defense protesters have made to the University of Massachusetts administration.

Until last week when they narrowed the list down to one demand — halt all military-funded research on campus — the list included restructuring the state Board of Regents of Higher Education, which the UMass administration has no power to do.

Such a demand steals credibility from a group the students would otherwise respect more. After all, whether to ban military-funded research in a higher education institution deserves serious consideration, especially since the protesters are charging that some research will be used for chemical warfare.

NATO and Warsaw Pact members have agreed to outlaw the use of chemical warfare, although the research itself has not been prohibited. Should the University take part in research for weapons whose use has been prohibited?

Or should the University redirect its research to serve the purposes of improving the economy and health?

Such valid questions have been clouded by some of the miscellaneous and probably unreasonable demands and by the university's decisions to call in the state police to arrest the protesters who executed three building occupations in two weeks.

The administration probably made a strategic blunder in its harsh decision to suspend the 19 University students who participated in last week's takeover of three offices in the Lederle Research Center. The suspensions and their direct outcome — a hunger strike by some of the protesters — have re-focused the public's attention from the real issue.

The protesters too have made strategic blunders. Occupying Lederle, which houses the Physical Sciences Library, didn't sit well with library users. Some students who said they sympathized with the protesters changed their minds when they tried to get into the library and police officers told them they couldn't.

In addition, persuading people that a secretive agency is undemocratic is obviously easier than to persuade national security-conscious people to condemn military research. Besides, the research is documented in unclassified papers.

Nevertheless, though the prospect seems implausible, the protesters could conceivably gather support from the students' majority. After all, critics of anti-Vietnam War demonstrations said the protesters would fail.

Pedro Pereira is a Collegian columnist

Real issues of protests ignored

The recent building takeovers protesting military-funded research on campus has become a less-than-popular movement with the student body. The protest against the Department of Defense has not stirred interest on campus. In fact, there's much student opposition to the movement. Bystanders cheered state police officers as they entered Memorial Hall to arrest over 60 students occupying the building. Students fumed outside the Graduate Research Center Library when they couldn't study and do research there last week. Radical demands to the administration, such as an ending to all DOD funding on campus and stopping any tuition hikes has forced more than the campus conservatives to wonder if this group has a grasp of the issues.

The issues at hand have been obscured among the scuffle, and the message never reached the students. The movement to resist being consumed by the military-industrial complex is the real issue. The military is an important institution and can be appropriate in educating students — provided its influence upon the University of Massachusetts is limited. Unfortunately, it has a profound influence here. Over the past eight years, the Pentagon has increased its funding to UMass by more than 2000 percent. The 13 million dollars the DOD will give UMass this year to fund its research is almost a quarter of all outside funding the University gets. Taking into account that the state is slashing UMass's budget, it's plain we are losing control of the school we attend.

The military is rich and Massachusetts is poor, which means that the military can provide us with a financially stable program. It also means the balance of power will swing toward the DOD unless the administration refuses to let it happen. The students and faculty should decide what their university produces and offers its students.

Students try to bring sick mate's mom to US

BOSTON (AP) — Students at Boston College High School are rallying around a sick classmate, raising more than $4,300 to try to arrange a visit from his mother, who has been unable to leave Vietnam.

Tommy Truong, a sophomore who will be 17 on May 21, is in a coma and on a life support system at Massachusetts General Hospital. He suffered a burst aneurysm in his brain April 23.

Eight years ago, his father, Joseph Truong, carried Tommy and his younger brother, one under each arm, in a walk to a boat to get them out of Vietnam, said the Rev. Charles F. Kelley, school chaplain.

They were separated but reunited at a refugee camp in Thailand. But Tommy's mother, Thuy Thi Le Truong, is in Saigon.

School officials have asked the offices of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and Rep. Chester Atkins, both Massachusetts Democrats, and the Red Cross and State Department to help.

The fund drive was proposed by Chris Nichol, 15, a sophomore from Quincy, who organized it with classmates John Callanan, 16, of Belmont, and Dan Hart, 16, of Hingham.

They make use of a mite box, a tradition in Jesuit-run institutions in which weekly collections are made for a good cause.

Students gave their lunch money and savings from jobs. Some parents wrote checks for $50 and $100.

"Tommy is a quiet boy, and not many of the kids knew him, but that didn't make any difference," said Lawrence Blake, principal.

Joseph Truong is an electronics technician. He and the boys live in the Charleston section. He has been trying without success to get his wife out of Vietnam for years. The needed documents from the United States have been obtained, Kelly said, "but getting her out of Vietnam has been the hard part."

Kelley said Tommy had rheumatic heart disease in Vietnam, and one year ago suffered a seizure from a blood clot. The clot was removed, but the youth returned to the hospital March 25.

CELEBRATE DIVERSITY

The retaining wall opposite the east entrance of the Campus Center will soon be the site of a mural to commemorate last year's Civility Week and create a permanent message that addresses the importance of continued civility awareness and progress. The idea for a civility mural came from Environmental Design major Jon Satz. A competition among students in the Art, Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning, and Afro-American Studies departments was conducted by the Arts Council, the Graduate Art Students Association (GASA,) and UARTS, the Art Department's undergraduate art students organization. Design proposals were juried by students from the Art and Landscape Architecture departments and the Third World Caucus, faculty, and staff. The design of a graduate art student, Jonathan Kohrman, was selected. He will start to paint the mural in early May. A series of scenes will depict University community members from many constituencies socializing, working, and learning together. University members may actually serve as models for some of the figures in the mural. During its creation we encourage you to stop and speak with the artist.

Black music suffers in a black and white world

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

"It was the music that fueled the engines of our struggle." That statement, by Black writer/activist Plythell Benjamin, summed up the theme of last Thursday night's panel discussion on Black Music and Social Change, which took place at the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union. The discussion, featuring four noted Black music activists, was part of the week's annual Black Musicians Conference. Dr. Frederick Tillis, music professor and Fine Arts Center director, moderated the discussion.

The first of the speakers was Vernon Reid, a guitarist best know as a member of the all-Black rock band Living Colour. He spoke of an experience the band had when they appeared with Big Audio Dynamite, a White rock band, as a last minute opening act. "People were assuming that we would play rhythm and blues, or dance music, or rap music," Reid said, but when they played rock, "people were surprised to say the least." He added that rock is seen as the music of White America, even though it was created by Blacks, and that Living Colour is "trying to reclaim our own culturak heritage, something that has been ours."

Playthel Benjamin followed by giving a colorful historical summary of how Black music has influenced the Black struggle for equality. He said that "the message in the music" of Negro spirituals kept the slaves going, and credited the singing of spirituals as an impetus for Nat Turner's slave revolt. He said that the music of the Black church "created much of the appeal of Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and sustained the soul of the entire Civil Rights movement."

Benjamin went on to discuss the positive image projected by jazz. "[It] has become a living example of the great American ideals of freedom and equality," he said, "Jazz musicians were elegantly dressed, serious Black men who seemed in charge of things and gave the impression of being really free." He added that jazz was a perfect paradigm for the radicalism of the 1960s, and that most Black political activists were jazz lovers.

Patti Brown, a pianist, composer and satirist, was the next speaker. She concentrated her remarks on the lack of exposure to Black music history given to Black children by this country's educational system. "I performed in junior high schools all over New York City, and I was astounded that most students did not know the name Duke Ellington," she said. She condemned the notion put forth by music educators that European classical music is the only "good" music, and blamed the media for its neglect of Black music.

Valley Jazz

Brown also called for the formation of a national organization to promote Black music, saying that it should foster awareness through educational programs, libraries and so on. She said that films and videos should be made "that stress the importance and creativity of the musicians, rather than exploiting the personal problems of their lives," thus alluding to the recent movie, Bird, about saxophonist Charlie Parker. She added that symphony orchestras should introduce the music of Black composers into their repertoires, and that Black churches should "embrace the complete spectrum of Black music," including jazz and blues in addition to spirituals, gospel and hymns.

Applause from the audience frequently interrupted the powerful speech of celebrated author Amiri Baraka, the panel's final speaker. He began by condemning imperialism as a force that "removes art from humanity, making art a mysterious, marketable commodity that must reflect the pathology and philosophy of imperialism to be valid." He said that the struggle for freedom inherent in Black music has always been supressed by Whites, from slavery times, when the slave masters banned the use of African drums, to the present: "Jazzy Jeff is given the music awards, and not Public Enemy, because silliness and cliche is always preferable to truth under the rule of White supremacy," said Baraka, referring to two contemporary rap artists.

He said that the White establishment has kept Black music down in order to preserve the status quo, "since art glorifies and valorizes the life of the artist and the people. If the art is allowed to exist, it will influence the people." For example, he asked, "Who could enslave Duke Ellington or (pianist) Art Tatum? Could you seriously believe someone who told you that (composer/bandleader) Sun Ra or (saxophonist) John Coltrane were inferior?," implying that these musicians' positive influences are anathemas to White domination.

Baraka concluded by reiterating the principal themes of the discussion: that Black music innovations have been spawned by social change movements, because the most sensitive artists' work reflects what is going on around them, and that the music has often actually contributed to the struggle. He also agreed with Brown that the introduction of Black music (particularly jazz) into the schools is an effective way of bringing about further social change.

Food, thought at Marcie's

By ANDREA HARTMAN

Creative energies were flowing in Amherst last Saturday when the Reading In A Restaurant series continued at Marcie's Place Restaurant. This was not a typical poetry reading, but a combination of poetry, music and letters placed in an unusual setting. The two writers who were featured were Northampton residents Josie Rawson and Shawn Vernon. Their backgrounds both include an MFA in poetry from the University of Iowa Creative Writing Program, and various published works.

The main idea behind the writer's series was to extend the possibilities of a restaurant to include the arts and become more of a gathering place. The food frying in the kitchen, casual atmosphere and friendly service proved to be just the right setting for the event. Poetry readings are unique. The writer has to relate directly to the audience. He becomes a type of performer and gives the piece a more personal feeling.

Josie Rawson read some of her poems that revealed personal events from her life and family. The poet's presence and her intense descriptions about certain places made it easy to become involved in the poems. Rawson used original, vivid imagery that placed the listener in another place and time for a brief moment.

Ranging from ghost stories to communal farms in Israel, both Rawson and Vernon explained their inspirations before each piece, greatly enhancing the audience's understanding.

The sense of deepness created by Rawson's poetry was lightened by the music of Shawn Vernon. Vernon played original folk pieces on guitar and harmonica. Some of his songs originated from the work of other writers such as Shakespeare and Robert Frost. Vernon also read some letters that he had written, one specific example being a letter to his high school librarian. The subject of this amusing note was the discovery of some books that had been overdue for 17 years. Vernon provided suggestions on how the school could spend the several thousand dollars in fines he paid.

Rawson and Vernon complemented each other's works very well and there was a good variation in their alternating performances.

N'dour, a chord of hope at Horse

Youssou N'Dour
Iron Horse Music Hall
May 8

Youssou N'Dour toured the world last year with Tracy Chapman, Peter Gabriel, Sting and Bruce Springsteen in the Amnesty International tour. Although the tour did give him much deserved publicity in the United States, the international star participated in the event because it is something he believes in.

"Music is the one aspect of culture that can really and truly pass a message on," N'Dour has said. His message got across Monday night at the grand opening of the newly expanded Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton. An Amnesty banner hung behind the stage. People from Amnesty circulated petitions for patrons to sign to free political prisoners, and Amnesty spokesperson, Sanat Majumder, introduced N'Dour after asking people to join the fight to free prisoners of conscience.

The Senjegalese N'Dour then took the stage with his eight piece band, Super Etoile du Dakar. Clad in a colorful shirt, faded blue jeans, and navy blue cap, N'Dour seemed almost bored at the outset of his first of many upbeat Afro-pop tunes. This could be due to the fact that this was the band's second show of the evening.

The band slowly warmed to the crowd. The thin, wiry N'Dour began shaking his rubber legs and cracking a few smiles. People in the crowd of all ages and etnic backgrounds began to get up and dance. Soon, everybody in the band was smiling and playing off each other, clearly enjoying each other's performances.

You would have to travel a great many miles to find a band much tighter than this one. Despite the cramped confines of the stage, (dancer Marietou Kote was unable to perform) the band blended brilliantly. Babacar Faye on the sabar drums was particularly outstanding. He kept the most complicated beats, and his hands moved faster than the human eye could follow on some incredible solos. The same is true of Assane Thiam who was on talking drum.

Keyboardist Alain Ehlrich and saxophonist Therno Koite added a nice melodic touch to many of the songs.

Peter Gabriel, whom N'Dour has opened for on his last two American tours, has said of N'Dour, "The voice sent shivers down my spine. It was one of the most extraordinary I've ever heard." If anything, that was an understatement. N'Dour proved that his angelic tenor voice can pack more emotion and range than that of Bono of U2.

The 12 song, hour and a half show did seem to drag for a bit in the middle, but only for a short while. For the most part, his upbeat music, cool dance moves, and infectious smile kept the crowd moving, especially in his white hot encore numbers which featured a sabar drum solo by Faye that was too amazing to describe.

A new album by N'Dour, Shaking the Tree (Virgin) will be out soon. The title track, which urges women's liberation in Senegal, was co-written with Peter Gabriel. The album, like the concert, will not be in English, save for a line here and there. But the music and emotion promises to make any listener stand up and take notice.

Visions of life, both light and dark

By BRYAN HOUSE

Two Masters of Fine Arts candidates, Cynthia Guild and Nancy Haver, presented their thesis exhibitions at the Herter Art Gallery last week. Cynthia Guild's There's No Place Like Home was an intense, gripping portrait of childhood.

Gallery

Most of Guild's paintings are dark pictures of houses or rooms, possibly referring to her own experiences, that suggest and portray the oppression and horrors of childhood. Guild uses two and three pictures for most titles, each portraying a different scene but conveying the same eerie feel as the others. Her brilliant titles: such as "We Don't Talk Anymore," "She's Afraid of the Dark," "Where Have You Been" and "I Know You Can Do Better" present the messages her paintings illuminate so clearly.

"She Wanted to be a Princess" consists of two paintings, the first of which presents a somewhat faint, dream-like mirror image of Cinderella's carriage over a dark blue background. The second is a picture of a one story house, lightly colored but with black windows. Guild relates the work to the Cinderella story, and the longing to escape from the drudgery and oppression of authority figures.

"Who Will Watch the Children" is a dark, grim work of three paintings. The first is the ceiling view of a dark room with menacing shadows, but with a window with light coming in. The second is a picture of a large two story house, the facade of which resembles a skull, watching over the house. The painting is very dark, mostly dark blue and black, and at the top of one of the windows, the mouth of the skull, there are a few small, white skulls which probably represent the children the house is watching. The third painting is just black paint smeared almost completely over a lighter background. Guild's excellent use of color and imagery convey the horrors her titles suggest.

Nancy Haver's exhibition, Variations: Recent Prints and Drawings, featured five subjects: "The Farm," "Father," "River," "Kate" and "Self-Portrait," interpreted in various media, including woodcut, intaglio, charcoal, pastel and monotype, which transform the tone and focus of each subject.

The "River" series displayed very well the changes due to variation. "River I," using aquaint, is an impressionistic view across a river at a forest on the other side. The trees are dark and lack definition, and the use of shadows is heightened. "River II," done with graphite, is the same view, but it is very light, almost completely gray. There is more definition to the trees, but the picture is still very soft and impressionistic.

"River V" is an example of the woodcut technique, which presents a very stark, precise view of the river. The picture is different, we see the edge of the river and a row boat. There is a heavy contrast between black and white, and the picture is almost haunting.

Each of Haver's subjects undergo the same type of transformation as seen in the "River" series. The changing contrasts between black and white are what add meaning and life to her superb presentation.

Canned Heat and fresh Phish. That describes the top acts at this spring's annual Southwest Concert, which takes place this Sunday afternoon at the Southwest fields.

The classic sound of Canned Heat [right] should be complemented well by the classic-rock, jazz, funk and psychedelic influenced Phish.

Canned Heat singer Bob Hite, and guitarist Alan Wilson have kept the band's original spirit alive, despite the deaths of two key bandmates. Their boogie-blues style was rocking staple long before ZZ Top or Stevie Ray Vaughn.

Phish have proved themselves time and again, and their Southwest appearance will no doubt bolster their already substantial and loyal following.

British chemist ordered to serve additional 10 years

Already sentenced to 16 years in federal prison for related drug charges

CHESAPEAKE, Va. (AP) — A British chemist known as "Dr. Speedo" yesterday got a 10-year state prison sentence added to the 16 years he has been ordered to serve in prison for trying to make methamphetamine.

Circuit Judge William L. Forbes gave Francis Ian Tonner the maximum sentence for possession of methamphetamine.

Commonwealth's Attorney Robert E. Kowalsky said Tonner will serve the state term before he reports to federal prison on a 16-year sentence imposed Thursday for attempting to manufacture methamphetamine.

Tonner, 59, still has a parole violation charge pending in Massachusetts, Kowalsky said.

Tonner, a native of Liverpool, England, pleaded guilty to possession of methamphetamine that he had in his pockets when police raided a drug laboratory on Thanksgiving Day.

A companion, Andrew McConaghy, killed himself by taking cyanide as police entered. Tonner also took a cyanide dose and recovered after hospitalization.

Kowalsky said Tonner was prosecuted under federal law because the Drug Enforcement Administration assisted in the probe and Tonner was likely to get a stiffer sentence than he would in state court.

"Under federal law they serve a greater percentage of that time than they get," Kowalsky said.

Tonner, a research chemist with doctorate level training who also was known as "The Wizard" by police, has faced drug charges in Massachusetts, Scotland, and Canada since the early 1970's.

He told authorities he started the Chesapeake lab last November to produce high-quality designer drugs that would become a legal substitute for crack cocaine.

Tonner has said he set up his first lab when he was 13 and got interested in psychedelic drugs with Timothy Leary and others at Harvard University in the early 1960's, before many of the substances were made illegal.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Keep your faith strong. Love relationships take on added color and joy. A change of scenery would do wonders for your disposition. A financial situation turns around in your favor. Reward your friends.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) A heart-to-heart talk will bring peace of mind. Solutions come with better communication. Keep in touch with family members and business associations at a distance. You need their input.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Check with your doctor before starting a strenuous exercise program or special diet. You need to do everything you can to strengthen a relationship. Changes at work prove beneficial for you.

LEO (July 23-Aug.22) You may soon get the good fortune you have been waiting for. Ask loved ones to be less selfish and think about what is best for you for a change. You need to alter your course.

VIRGO (Aug.23-Sept.22) Use the phone instead of travelling and you will be cheered by the results. Be more gracious with your co-workers. Show special tact with peers of the opposite sex. Avoid flippant comments.

LIBRA (Sept.23-Oct.22) What is worth a while. Stop dwelling on a mistake and move on! Do not decline an offer without first exploring what it could mean to you both emotionally and financially.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov.21) Stop worrying about what others think and follow your best instincts. Do everything you can to stabilize a work or financial situation. It is not a crime to change your mind. Heed your conscience.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov.22-Dec.21) Stop fault-finding and search for ways to turn negatives into positives. Clear up a misunderstanding before real harm is done. A great day for negotiating business deals. Put your best foot forward.

CAPRICORN (Dec.22-Jan.19) Recent events make it possible for you to pursue a lifelong dream. You need someone new to help you run a business. Bring in a partner you can trust to protect your interests.

AQUARIUS (Jan.20-Feb.18) Although your honesty improves your chances for success you may be too outspoken for your own good. Listen to a friend's advice, but make your own decisions. Your determination will be rewarded.

PISCES (Feb.19-March 20) Advise a friend who you know is too insecure to move forward. Be upbeat and positive! Magnificent trends bring new romantic, domestic and financial solutions. Push up a deadline without further delay.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) A family member will have a positive influence on your career and finances. You will not gain your objective without taking some calculated risks. Strike while the iron is hot.

Vickers and Richardson maintain they were not allowed on the bus to Dartmouth because they were wearing white socks rather than dress socks.

"He wanted us to have colored socks and he said we had eight minutes to get them," Vickers said. "I don't know where he expected us to find them at Boyden at 7 in the morning."

Chambers said, "I think it was bad feelings between some of the players and the coaches."

Stone has stated throughout the season that he was not pleased with the leadership of the seniors.

"When we tried to be leaders, we were called 'too cocky' and 'too good,'" Chambers said.

"I think Coach is frustrated," Vickers said. "I didn't see it coming [getting kicked off the team] but when it happened, it didn't surprise me."

"This will be one of the days I remember," Meehan said.

The sixth would provide a little controversy. Jean Cardone started the inning off and appeared to make contact outside the box on a bunt attempt. "He said no. What are you going to do?" Sortino asked.

With new life Cardone singled and one out later Lori Mongillo also singled. Wanner looked like she would escape on a groundball up the middle to Duff at shortstop. But her throw to first on the double-play attempt was high, allowing Cardone to score. The Panthers would add another run, and with the top of the order coming up, Aprile came on in relief and got the final four batters for her second save of the year.

only walk of the afternoon was his mistake but he committed one of baseball's cardinal sins — walking the leadoff hitter. NU's Peter Charpentier scored the winning one, as he was bunted over to second and moved to third on second baseman Dave Edwards' error. Charpentier was then squeezed in by Olivo.

"Conroy did a spectacular job," said Stone. "But we didn't hit the ball. We had a chance with the suicide squeeze, but we just didn't execute."

Stone is referring to the similar tactic used by the Minutemen to try and score Edwards from third in the fourth, but he was tagged out at the plate.

Perhaps an indicator of what the day would be like was when Drew Comeau was the victim of a bad hop in the first inning, as he required 35 stiches to close up the cut in his jaw and mouth. He later returned late in the second game.

The Minutemen will play out the season against Harvard tomorrow afternoon (3 p.m.) at Lorden Field.

baseball don't have the gumption to do that, but the crowds would still come out and you can bet the strike wouldn't last long."

McDonough made three predictions about the NFL, which he has covered for the bulk of his career.

He said the responsibilites of the NFL commissioner, a post Pete Rozelle held from 1961 until his retirement this year, will now be broken down into four positions. He also predicted Paul Taglibue, currently the NFL's lawyer, will be named the next commissioner, and that the league will expand by six teams in the next decade.

Three inducted into hoop Hall of Fame

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — K.C. Jones and Lenny Wilkens, two all-star guards who played and then coached against each other, were inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame together yesterday.

Also enshrined was William "Pop" Gates, 71, who played with the New York Renaissance and other teams during the game's barnstorming years in the 1930s and 1940s.

"I'm really happy to be being installed with K.C.," said Wilkens, one of the game's smoothest shooters, prior to the installation ceremonies. "Playing against him was like going to war. He was a great defensive player and would give you no edge."

"My Way," Jones said, displaying a warm tenor singing voice and a smile when asked if he could put a theme song to his career. "This was a complete surprise. It isn't the sort of thing that's supposed to happen to people who can't shoot."

"It's the icing on the cake for everything and everybody who touched me down to junior high school when the coach called me off the playground and asked if I wanted to play basketball," Jones said. "Each one had a hand in pushing me up a little and up a little bit more. And now I'm through the air."

Jones, the 18th person associated with the Celtics to be installed in the Hall of Fame, played nine seasons for Boston, during which the Celtics won eight NBA championships, and then coached Boston to the 1984 and 1986 championships. He stepped down as coach following the 1987-88 season. Jones played on consecutive NCAA championship teams, along with Celtics teammate Bill Russell, at the University of San Francisco in 1955 and 1956.

It was at San Francisco that he first turned to defense. "I grew three inches over the summer between high school and college and all of a sudden my shot was just gone," Jones recalled. "I had no idea what the problem was, but I knew I had to adapt if I was going to stay on the team."

"Lenny was a great pleasure to play against, because he was such a challenge," Jones said. "He kept you off balance all the time. He never looked like he was doing anything and he'd have dozens of points and steals."

Wilkens, who coached the Seattle Supersonics to the NBA championship in 1979, was able to make the enshrinement ceremonies after his Cleveland Cavaliers were eliminated from the playoffs by Chicago, 101-100, on Michael Jordan's jumper at the buzzer.

"The pain's beginning to go away, but it will still be there for a while," Wilkens said.

His thoughts also travelled back to his boyhood in New York and the Rev. Thomas Mannion, the parish priest who got him interested in sports.

"My dad died when I was quite young and it was Father Mannion who tried to channel my energies and those of a lot of kids into something worthwhile," he said. "I was nine or 10 at the time. And when I got interested in basketball he told me I had to learn the fundamentals if I wanted to get really good and he helped me with drills. I still stop in and see him whenever I get back to New York."

After graduating from Providence College in 1960, he went on to average 16.5 points and 6.7 assists a game during a 15-year NBA career with St. Louis, Seattle, Portland and Cleveland.

"I never thought about the pros. I went to college for the education and was all set with a graduate assistantship and then a job teaching economics at Providence," Wilkens said. "I didn't even see a pro game live until my senior year in college. But then I felt I could compete and why not try it."

"I'm just happy to still be here and be able to smell the roses," said Gates, who turned professional after leading Benjamin Franklin High School to the 1938 New York City championship. He was a member of the 1939 New York Rens, which won 68 straight games and the world professional championships in Chicago. Gates was the only player to appear in all 10 world professional basketball tournaments made up of barnstorming teams.

He wound up his career as player-coach of the Harlem Globetrotters in 1955.

Reid to leave Tarheels

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. (AP) — North Carolina junior forward J.R. Reid said yesterday he will turn professional and give up his final year of college eligibility.

"I have to do what's best for J.R. Reid," he said at a news conference.

Reid said he convinced his mother that turning pro was best for him after he promised her he would obtain his degree next year.

Playing he senior year at North Carolina under Coach Dean Smith would have been fun, Reid said, but he had to do what was best for him. He said he wanted to be available for the NBA draft next month.

Reid, a 6-foot-9 junior from Virginia Beach, Va., must declare in writing by Saturday that he will enter the June 27 draft.

Reid will become the fourth UNC junior to go to the NBA a year early. Previously, Michael Jordan, James Worthy and Robert McAdoo all went early. Like Reid, Jordan and Worthy did so after being advised by Smith.

Reid played on the 1988 U.S. Olympic team, was a consensus All-American as a sophomore, a freshman All-American and a consensus high school All-American at Kempsville High School in Virginia Beach. However, he failed to make the All-ACC team this past season.

Reid missed nine games with an injury. When he returned, he did not start until late in the season.

The UMass softball team swept Adelphi yesterday at Totman Field, capping its unbeaten home season at 16-0.

Softball team enjoys sweep of Adelphi

Last home games a success for two seniors

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Correspondent

Who says that you can't win them all? That's exactly what the University of Massachusetts softball team did yesterday at Totman Field.

By sweeping Adelphi University, 1-0 and 4-3, the Minutewomen finished their regular season unbeaten at home in 16 games. They also set themselves up for this weekend's Atlantic 10 tournament at Rutgers University starting Friday. UMass is seeded second.

"Our magic number is three," said UMass coach Elaine Sortino, referring to a possible NCAA playoff bid.

Game one saw a class pitcher's duel between freshman Holly Aprile and Adelphi's Chris Cage. Neither team had anything that amounted to a threat until Adelphi managed to load the bases in the top of the seventh with none out. Aprile was able to extricate herself as she got out of the inning unharmed.

With one out in the bottom of the eighth, Jenn Vaillancourt reached on an error by the Adelphi right fielder. Cherie DellAnno sacrificed her over to second and a single by Jen Miller put the winning run at third. Senior Barbara Meehan, playing in her last home game, bounced a single over the head of the Adelphi third baseman to score Vaillancourt with the winning run.

The win was Aprile's 20th of the year, which tied the UMass record set by Lynn Stockley in 1986. Her record now stands at 20-9.

In the second game Christine Wanner started her last game for UMass at home and the co-captain pitched well, going five-plus innings for the win to put her record at 11-8.

UMass drew first blood in the bottom of the second. With two out Wanner reached on an error and moved to third after Mary Duff reached on a bunt single and the throw went over the head of the first baseman.

Wanner then scored on a wild pitch with Duff moving to second, and Meehan delivered Duff with a blast over the center fielder's head to make it 2-0.

Wanner had defense behind her in the top of the third as Vaillancourt snagged a line drive headed for right field and again in the fourth as Meehan made a nice diving catch for one out and on the next pitch, Miller also made a great diving catch.

Adelphi scored its first run of the day in the fifth as Val Muller tripled and scored when Lisa Bellacosa flied deep to center. On the play Meehan made a great throw and almost got the runner at the plate. "It came in at the same time," said catcher DellAnno, but in the collision with Muller it became impossible to hold the ball.

UMass added two more in the fifth. Bonnie Schilling led off with a single up the middle. With two out Miller singled to left to move Schilling to second. A wild pitch advanced both runners and set up Meehan again. Again she came through, doubling to the fence in center and scoring both runners to make it 4-1.

Problems continue for UMass baseball

Minutemen swept by NU; final home game today against Harvard

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

You figure that at the end of a long, frustrating season, the big guy above could give the University of Massachusetts baseball team a break or two.

Maybe a nice little three-game winning streak to close out the year? But nope, it was not to be as the Minutemen (17-27) continued to pile up the losses, dropping a doubleheader to visiting Northeastern University (18-20-1), 1-0 and 7-6, yesterday at Lorden Field under sunny skies.

In the second game of the twinbill, the Minutemen built a comfortable lead as they crossed the plate five times in the first three innings, but excellent relief pitching by Rick Deraney and Dave Barnard kept UMass at bay, allowing one run in the final four frames, while Northeastern was able to rally against Dave Telgheder.

"Deraney did a nice job of setting up Barnard," said Huskie coach Neil McPhee, "and our bats woke up and got the job done." A distraught UMass head coach Mike Stone said, "Their pitchers didn't fool us . . . what hurt us was our lousy defense."

UMass carried leads of 5-2 and 6-4 into the fifth and sixth innings, but Northeastern took over as the Huskie bats rapped six hits and five runs off of senior reliever Dave Telgheder. After 'Gator' came in and got starter Dan O'Leary out of a bases-loaded jam in the fourth, he gave up two runs on three hits in the fifth.

Like Telgheder, senior Rick Deraney produced immediately as he came in and picked off the inherited runner (from starter Bob Nicklas) at first. The hard-throwing southpaw had a 1-2-3 fourth but gave up a solo shot to first baseman Drew Seccafico over the 370 sign in left-center the following inning.

However, Seccafico went from hero to scapegoat in the sixth as he bobbled a Paul Baroncelli throw from third, extending the inning. Northeastern promptly capitalized on the mistake, as Dana Olivo slapped a two-run single up the middle, giving the visitors a lead they would never relinquish.

Deraney was then lifted in favor of closer Barnard, who put the clamps on the Minutemen in the final two innings. Barnard, in the Kent Tekulve-Dan Quisenberry mold, overpowered UMass as he threw no-hit relief while striking out three.

UMass built its lead by striking early and often. In the two-run first, it was Northeastern who shot themselves in the foot with two errors. The Minutemen showed their power, as Baroncelli lined a dinger over the 330 sign in left, and Brian Bright hit a two-run blast following a Jack Card triple.

In the first game, sophomore Brian Conroy pitched a three-hitter against his former mates, but ended up being the hard luck loser as Northeastern scored the lone unearned Huskie run in the last inning.

In a close game such as this one, both teams tried to use the suicide squeeze to get the deciding run, and Northeastern was able to do it better than UMass. Conroy's

Seven players gone from UMass team

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team was noticeably short of players during yesterday's doubleheader with Northeastern University, as seven players either quit or were kicked off the team in the last week.

Seniors Steve Kern, Mike Chambers, Bill Vickers, Jeff Richardson and Gary Stewart, sophomore Doug Dubiel and freshman Shawn Phillips are no longer on the UMass team.

UMass coach Mike Stone said he kicked Kern, a co-captain, and Chambers off the team for disciplinary reasons, and red-shirted Phillips. It was the second time this season that Kern was kicked off.

"The first time he kicked me off, after the Springfield loss, he said I didn't care and I wasn't trying," Kern said. "The way he was running us lately, it seemed like he was trying to get people to quit."

According to Stone, Richardson and Vickers missed the bus last Wednesday travelling to a game at Dartmouth University and haven't been seen by the team since. Stewart missed practice Saturday and hasn't shown up since, and Dubiel has a bad arm, according to Stone.

"Things got bad and they jumped ship," senior co-captain Dave Telgheder said. "But we don't need them around."

The players involved, however, disagreed.

"We didn't jump ship. We were thrown off the ship," Chambers said. "I was told by Coach that he didn't like my attitude. I ran for 45 minutes last week because I was one minute late for practice. I could have quit then but I didn't."

Columnist: Pay TV taking over pro sports

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

The future of professional sports lies in cable television, and by the year 2000 all major sporting events will be on pay television, a Boston Globe columnist told about 100 people in the Campus Center yesterday.

Will McDonough, CBS reporter and veteran football writer for The Globe, talked about the future of sports and the sports media in a lecture sponsored by the Department of Sport Studies.

"Pay TV is going to take over," McDonough said. "I think within five years the majority of NFL games will be on pay television and within 10 years, the Super Bowl will be on pay TV.

"Teams are hiring corporate business guys," he said, "because the bottom line is to bring in TV revenue."

Television's rise to power is also engulfing the job market, according to McDonough, who began writing for the Globe upon his graduation from Northeastern in 1960.

"If you've got a goal to shoot for, I'd say go towards television, because it's expanding," McDonough said. "So many newspapers are closing and merging and when that happens, the jobs dry up.

"There's also more power and money in television," said McDonough, who began working for CBS's NFL Today in 1985. "Cable television is expanding into all the small towns and each time that happens, positions open up."

McDonough also spoke about spiraling players' salaries and the power struggles between owners and players.

"As long as owners want to win, salaries will continue to go up," McDonough said. "And when a contract runs out, there will always be a confrontation.

"If the NFL negotiates a five-year contract and when that runs out, they immediately work out a new one, then Gene Upshaw [executive director of the NFL Players' Association] is getting paid all this money and he's only worked two days in 10 years.

"But the reason salaries go up is not because people negotiate, it's because owners are competitive. History shows that even without unions, salaries go up."

The salary wars also periodically cause players' strikes, and McDonough offered a solution to the possibility of a baseball strike in 1990.

"If I were an owner, I'd tell my players that if they went on strike, I'd bring up the whole [Triple A] Pawtucket team, put them in the Red Sox uniforms, and they'd play at Fenway Park. The owners in

50 continue Memorial Hall occupation

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Protesters freely climbed in and out of the windows of Memorial Hall yesterday, delivering food and blankets to more than 50 demonstrators who occupied the building Tuesday night.

The demonstrators stormed and barricaded Memorial Hall Tuesday at 11 p.m., vowing to stay there until the administration responded to their demands.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey issues a statement to the protesters occupying Memorial Hall. Text excerpts on page 3.

The protesters want all military-funded research at the University of Massachusetts halted and disciplinary action against students who were arrested dropped. They blocked the exits with chairs, tables, and dozens of boxes of computer paper.

As of press time no arrests were made.

More than 20 protesters originally entered Memorial Hall at about 9:30 p.m. Tuesday through a door that leads to a lower level room. The protesters quietly made their way upstairs to the main hall on the ground floor. The demonstrators sat in fetal positions in the dark room behind chairs and couches.

People downstairs heard noise from upstairs and called the police. All but two of the protesters left the building when they realized their presence was noticed.

Two demonstrators hid in the fireplace to let inside the protesters who planned to occupy the building later, Nathan Guisinger, a protester, said.

There were no police in or around the building Tuesday night or Wednesday.

"The students have the building," said Jeanne Hopkins, University spokeswoman. "In the previous incidents, the police have been inside. This is not like before, it's not a sit-in, they have blockaded the doors and taken over."

"This is not a sign they want to deal with the issue," she said. "There was a public forum last night to discuss the issue and an emergency meeting of the Faculty Senate is scheduled for Thursday, there has been progress. How serious can we take them when they do this?"

The six people who are still hunger striking and three who are fasting met with Vice Chancellor Dennis Madson in his office yesterday afternoon to discuss lifting the suspension placed on the UMass students arrested last week in the Graduate Research Center.

Eight of the protesters are UMass students and one is a five-college student. Madson said that only the UMass students could participate in the meeting, but the protesters insisted all fasters and hunger strikers be present. Both parties agreed to allow the five-college student to attend the meeting as long as she remainded silent.

After death, safety at pond reassessed

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

The recent death of University of Massachusetts junior Paul W. Ryan at Puffers Pond is prompting the town of Amherst to re-examine safety at one of the area's most popular swimming holes.

Town Conservation Director Peter Westover said safety at the pond has not been a serious problem in the past, but because of the recent tragedy, increased security measures may be taken.

"We will be looking carefully at procedures to make them better," he said. "We have talked about in the past putting up another fence to keep people off the dam, but once they are in the water, there's nothing we can do about it."

Ryan was found Tuesday west of the pond's dam, under a submerged log in the Mill River. Westover said the area around the dam is already fenced off and signs have been posted warning people to stay off the dam and rocks.

Michael Letcher, assistant town manager, said he is waiting to hear the final police report before considering if any action needs to be taken.

"Once we have the full report we are going to review it and take additional precautions to make sure a thing like this doesn't happen again," he said.

About six years ago, because of the pond's popularity, caretakers were assigned to control swimmers and hikers and keep the area clean, he said.

The pond officially opened for the season yesterday and caretakers will be on duty from about 11 a.m. until dusk every day until Sept. 31, Westover said.

The responsibilities of the caretakers include keeping people from swimming too close to the dam, diving from a 15 foot ledge near the dam and, if necessary, assisting swimmers in trouble, he said.

Although the caretakers' main duties are not to save swimmers, Westover said, "it is exactly what they would do. It's just they don't wear a life guard sign on their backs."

Westover said lifeguards have never been hired because the conservation department does not want to encourage swimming in the pond.

"We're not really inviting swimming but we acknowledge that swimming occurs. [But] we don't want people to rely on guards to pull them out," he said.

Westover said they cannot stop people from swimming because the pond is part of state conservation land and, by law, is open to the public.

"We ask and expect that people will continue to follow the regulations there, will use good sense and do what the caretakers tell them to do," he said.

Regents board ups tuition 7.7 percent

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

The Board of Regents of Higher Education approved a 7.7 percent tuition increase Tuesday for Massachusetts' 29 public colleges and universities. The hike goes into effect in September.

The increase will raise in-state undergraduate tuition at the University of Massachusetts $108 from $1,404 to $1,512 and hike in-state graduate tuition $132 from $1,758 to $1,890.

The increase is expected to generate about $3 million in additional revenue for the Amherst campus because it falls under the tuition retention plan.

In an impact statement sent to Patricia McGovern (D-Lawrence), chairwoman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, Chancellor Joseph Duffey stated that the tuition increase will not be subtracted from the $230 emergency curriculum fee approved by the UMass Board of Trustees as had been originally planned.

James Langley, a University spokesman, said this may not happen if the Senate version of the budget raises funding for public higher education. If not, students will be paying the fee and increase.

"Everything we said earlier was based on the assumption that we would have close to level funding" for fiscal year 1990, he said.

"As we look at next year we realize we have to increase fees based on the House budget. Even with the increase and additional revenue [from tuition retention] we will still be about $8.6 million short," he said.

Although the increases are supposed to be offset by relaxed financial aid guidelines allowing more students

Religious couple will not claim responsibility for child's death

BOSTON (AP) — Lawyers for a Christian Science couple argued to the state Supreme Court on yesterday that they should not be punished for causing their son's death by not seeking medical treatment because of their religious beliefs.

The outcome of the case is being closely watched by many of the estimated 650,000 members of the Christian Science church who shun doctors and medicine and espouse spiritual healing.

Rikki Klieman, attorney for David and Ginger Twitchell, told Judge Herbert Wilkins that the pending manslaughter charges against the couple are unfair according to current state laws. She has asked that the case not go to trial and the charges be dismissed.

At issue is an amendment to the state child abuse and neglect law passed in 1971 to recognized spiritual healing as an alternative to modern medicine.

Christian Scientists are protected by the law, which allows parents to care for their children by "spiritual" means, Klieman said. At present, there are no laws on the books that declare the point at which parents must call in doctors, she said.

"The problem is, they do not know what the law is," said Klieman, referring to the Twitchells, formerly of the city's Hyde Park section, and other Christian Scientists. "They know they have been told by the Legislature that they will not be prosecuted for caring for their children

'It's a safety issue'

SGA calls for relocation of Cutback City

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate, in one of its final acts of the semester, voted unanimously last night to support the removal of "Cutback City" from beside the campus pond.

The motion, proposed by Sens. W. Greg Rothman, Steve Lutz, Brian Darling, and Doug Dratch, is a recommendation to the administration to either relocate the "city," to the steps of the Statehouse in Boston or to another "fitting place."

"I would hope the administration would act on it as soon as possible so we can have it removed by graduation," Rothman said.

Clarinda Rose-Turner, acting co-president of the Commuter Area Government, said the 11 ramshackle huts, which were erected more than three months ago in protest of state budget cuts, now present a safety hazard to the campus.

Rose-Turner, who supported the proposal, said she was walking by the city Tuesday night when a man grabbed her hand and tried to lead her into a hut.

"He may have meant no harm, but it certainly didn't sound like it," she said. "There are people who are going to be very upset about this [the motion], but it's a safety issue now."

The city has been criticized in recent weeks for its lack of direction in fighting budget cuts and its failure to generate significant student support.

Before spring break, the city's population peaked at about 20 people sleeping overnight, but has been likened to a ghost town of late, with its population depleting to 10 residents.

"The people who founded the city aren't living there anymore," Rose-Turner said.

The city was also the site of vandalism three weeks ago, when resident Matt Russ said he discovered profanity spray painted on several of the huts.

Two weeks ago, a teepee which once stood more than 10 feet high, burned to the ground. The fire was not reported to campus authorities, and Environmental Health and Safety worker Rick Mears said the incident was under investigation. Mears, who noted several safety violations in the city including a lack of fire extinguishers and smoke alarms in many huts, said EHS is opposed to allowing the city to remain on campus.

Student Speaker John Dunlap said the senate does not have the authority to raze the city, and will only suggest its removal to the administration.

"This is not our power," Dunlap said. "This is only a recommendation to the powers that be."

The senate honored Student Trustee Stephanie Orefice, who Dunlap called one of the "greatest student trustees this University has ever had."

Orefice, who is honored for her efforts in mobilizing students across the state to fight state budget cuts, served for three years as a student senator from Moore House, one term as co-vice president of Southwest Area Government, and in countless other positions during her years at the University of Massachusetts.

"Stephanie is truly one of the finest examples of a student leader this University has ever had," Dunlap said. "She's recognized as the one student who's mobilized us against the budget cuts. She never lost faith."

Female security officer keeps UMass nights safe

Student Security officer Liz Smith

Last in a 10-part series on life at the University of Massachusetts

Under the moon and occasional street lights, the bent bookworms step to their halls. Security watches their path.

As the night wanes, loneliness bites at security's heels as they travel the walkways alone. The radio crackles, breaking the silence. Hourly, a squawking voice sounds for Security Supervisor Liz Smith, and waits for her answer.

"That helps a lot when you know the people you work with can back you up if you need it," said Smith. "Sometimes, I admit, I get a little nervous if I'm on a dark path."

The student security office in the Dickinson Hall police station uses a portable radio to make sure security supervisors remain safe during their patrols of the grounds, she said.

Smith, 22, is one of six women who make up the 30 student security supervisors at the University of Massachusetts.

Smith is a beacon. While some praise her for her courage, others give her flack.

"I've had some verbal abuse," she said. Then she leans back and smiles. During her shift one night some men yelled obscenities to her from afar, she said.

"A lot of times when a woman is in an authority position they're viewed as being a bitch," she said. "And I've had that name called to me many times, and that gets frustrating sometimes."

Sometimes she serves as the peacemaker. One night she opened the door to a residence hall to find an intoxicated man harassing the security receptionist who signs people into the buildings. As a female, she acted as the de-escalator in this instance, she said, noting that a male security supervisor would have been seen as a threat by the intoxicated man.

"But at other times it's backfired," she said. Another time a man tried to intimidate her because she was a woman.

"They feel they can first give me some abuse because they think I might cry and run away," she said. "This job has really helped me in confronting people who are yelling at me."

Smith, who is thinking about becoming police officer, attributes her peaceful

Students finding few jobs in their majors for summer

By RONALD J. AGRELLA
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students searching for temporary summer jobs relating to their majors will find fewer opportunities, says Jeffrey Silver, assistant director for cooperative education at the University Career Center.

"Companies complain that by the time your trained, it's time for you to leave [to go back to school]. So they're looking for more long-term jobs to fill," Silver said.

Many students said they have already begun job searching have encountered such problems.

"Unless you like working for a fast food place there aren't that many opportunities to get job for your career," explained Eric Scott, UMass freshman.

Among better career-oriented job opportunities this summer will be work relating to hotel, restaurant and travel administration, elementary education and engineering jobs, Silver said.

HRTA majors are expected to have the least trouble finding jobs because of the large tourist season that creates a high employment demand, he said.

The co-op program is an option for students to gain experience for their careers, Silver said. However, long-term co-ops that start in the summer and continue through the fall semester are most desirable for companies, he said.

"It's important for students to get experience and see what they want to do," Silver said. "The experience of a co-op later helps them to get a job and while on a co-op get good money." The average salary for co-ops last year was more than $8 per hour, he said.

A co-op is an alternative because of low career-oriented employment opportunities, he said. However many students do not have the time to take an internship or co-op so they look for any available job, usually out of necessity and can not get experience, Silver said.

"I'll be working security in a store," said junior Richard Gray, a business major. "It has nothing to do with my major. I tried to make some connections but the only [career-oriented] things were internships."

Many students said they sacrifice major-related jobs simply because they do not pay enough. According to Silver, many unskilled and semi-skilled jobs pay more.

"I'm going to work for the Metropolitan District Commission in Boston as a pool attendant for about $7.50 per hour," said sophomore Pamela Wilkins, a journalism major. "The job has no relation to my major, but I couldn't find one that paid enough money."

Although it may be difficult, Silver said it is important to try to gain some experience before graduation.

"I would suggest trying pounding the pavement for jobs . . . For students to graduate without job experience is crazy," he said.

Duffey asks for occupation's end; to offer commission at meeting today

Editor's note: The following are excerpts from a statement issued yesterday by Chancellor Joseph Duffey regarding the Memorial Hall occupation

I call upon the students now occupying Memorial Hall to withdraw and return to their studies. The propriety of Department of Defense funding has been and will continue to be actively discussed on this campus. Given the level of controversy, the issue is not likely to go away. Nothing further will be gained by illegal and improper actions on the part of students. . . .

At tomorrow's Faculty Senate meeting I will ask for the creation of a Campus Commission on America's Economic Future to explore those elements that threaten our society today and what can be done to build a stronger, more productive American economy. . . .

Onlookers divided on protest

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

With the occupation of Memorial Hall in full swing yesterday afternoon and speakers making arguments for and against military research at the University of Massachusetts, many of those watching outside were divided on the issue.

Some of the more vocal spectators, such as W. Greg Rothman and Paul McGonnigal of the conservative newspaper The Minuteman, left no doubt as to where they stand.

"We're here to represent the mainstream view on this campus," that many people are in favor of Department of Defense research dollars, Rothman said.

"These [demonstrators] understand they are miserable merchants of unaccepted views. I'm just here as a noted conservative activist," he said.

Most spectators held the view that although the protesters made good points, their tactics are on the extreme side and detract from their arguments.

"I'm supportive of their [ideas] but not their tactics — the whole thing is getting kind of silly," said freshman Josh Rice, a history major.

"I'm in favor of the student stuff but as far as DOD research goes, I think that's an intricate part of our campus.

The idea that the University is not observing due process in the suspensions of the protesters was a common theme among the crowd.

Sophomore Ari Vais, an English major and a occupier of the Graduate Research Center last Wednesday, said he believes the University suspending 10 of last Wednesday's GRC occupants without any kind of hearing is wrong and they should be allowed one.

"More than anything else I'm really psyched that people are doing these [takeovers]" because activism and speaking out on ideological beliefs is not common in the 1980s, he said.

It has been recognized by the Department of Defense, among others, that the principal threat to our nation's security today is neither weapons nor military strategy. The greatest threat to our nation's security is an economy which is failing to support the kind and quality of education which will prepare young people. . . . We are educating too few engineers and scientists and ignoring needs in the health and education of millions of poor children. We know and care too little about the rest of the world. There is widespread illiteracy and voter apathy. . . .

Perhaps most of all, our national security is threatened by the lack of confidence many young people have in the future. As a nation we have the resources to restore that confidence and to build a healthy and strong economy. As an education institution we have a responsibility to consider these questions, not simply in rhetorical debate but with serious concentration and study.

The kind of study and deliberation I propose must inevitably focus on the question of Department of Defense funded research. Much of that research on this campus is directed toward basic scientific discovery and is primarily applicable to civilian and commercial technologies. . . .

The Commission I will propose will be asked to address these questions. . . . These are serious questions. Achieving consensus may be difficult if not impossible. After all, in a pluralistic nation such as ours, there are many points of view that deserve consideration and respect.

From A to Z, EWC library is A-OK, director says

By SHARON WILKEY
Collegian Staff

After lugging your books to the textbook annex only to discover they will not be assigned to next year's class and therefore cannot be sold, don't despair.

If the books are for, by or about women, the Everywoman's Center will save you from packing yet another box to throw in the trunk of your car and take home.

The library at the EWC, tucked away on the second floor of Wilder Hall, relies on donations from those at the University and in the community as its primary means of acquiring books.

Sandy Mandel, the coordinator of the Resource and Referral Program which operates the library, said, "We really count on these donations to keep the library going."

As Mandel says, the EWC collection of books "pretty much goes from A to Z." The books, divided into sections of poetry, fiction and nonfiction, cover such topics as health, feminist theory, working women, and sports and travel.

"The library is one of the few places to find lesbian fiction," Mandel added, pulling out a worn and yellowed copy of one of the first novels written about a lesbian relationship, "The Well of Lonliness," written in 1928 by Radclyffe Hall.

"A lot of the books here are not readily available in any 'regular' library," Mandel said. But, she added, no one type of book dominates the EWC library.

The shelves now hold works by such varied authors as feminist Andrea Dworkin and mystery writer Agatha Christie. Some books used in University of Massachusetts classes are available, and students often use the library to conduct research for term papers, she said.

"A lot of women are on a very tight budget," Mandel said, adding that the EWC collection has been able to help UMass students by making books used in University courses available for borrowing at no cost.

Women and men who will fill out a library card may borrow two books at a time for up to two weeks, Mandel said. Free of charge, the lending library is open from 9 a.m to 4 p.m. weekdays except Wednesday, and on Wednesday from noon to 7 p.m. Donations of books will be accepted during these hours, she said.

When the EWC receives more than two copies of the same book, Mandel said, the extras are passed on to local women's organizations or to the women's prison in Framingham.

"It's a great reason to give, to know that you are being supportive to someone else," Mandel said.

disposition to training and also to just watching UMass police in action.

"From my observations they're very good at what they do. I've learned a lot by watching them. That's part of the reason I'm not that nervous," she said.

She said she is also not nervous because she is well seasoned in karate. During her first year at the University, Smith, now a senior, took a gym class called Self Defense for Women. She then joined the UMass Gojuryu Karate Club, and last year she went to Okinawa, Japan to study karate and martial arts weapons for one year. She now teaches a karate class.

"I'm very confident in defending myself," she said. What makes her nervous is that someone would have the gall to attempt attacking her from behind.

"I consider it a safe campus, but things can happen anywhere," she said. "It's just that I am a woman that makes me a target."

Some of her women friends get mad that they can't walk alone at night, she said.

"It's true women shouldn't have to, but you want to out smart them by thinking ahead," she said. "I would recommend to other people to walk with someone."

Off-duty one night, she was walking on campus when a co-worker noticed she was alone. He called an escort for her.

"I knew he was right. I should practice what I preach," she said. "I'm putting myself in a more dangerous position than I have to be."

Policing observatory path, the gravel road lined with shrubbery that connects Orchard Hill to Sylvan and has no lighting, is the only job Smith has opted not to do because it is simply too dangerous, she said. Someone could attack her from behind and the path is too far from the populated areas for someone to see or hear her, she said.

"I don't know any of the men who don't do it. But I don't do it," she said. "I wanna use my head about where I go."

Another security supervisor patrols observatory path when Smith is on duty.

For the most part, Smith praises her co-workers for their assistance. She joined the force in the fall of 1986 when only one woman was working. When the other woman left later that year, Smith was the only woman on the force for awhile.

"I got a lot of support from my male supervisors," she said.

The following year Smith went to Japan. "When I came back I had a little difficulty because they thought I was new," she said. "Sometimes I felt they would help me out more than if I was a man."

The supervisors use a professional procedure when talking on their radios. When she was standing with a male supervisor, the man might say the code to her before she responded on the radio.

"They might say it to me thinking I didn't know," she said. But working with others is always adjustment, she added.

"Some people think I'm crazy, one, for doing it, and two, for doing it because I'm a woman," she said.

Her mother is particularly concerned, she said. "She doesn't like it. She's never liked it. She says she'll send me the money if it's the money I need," she said.

The money, at about $4.30 per hour, is not why Smith does the job, she said. Smith said she enjoys knowing she's doing something useful in helping people get home.

After she escorts a woman home along lighted paths, she said, "Sometimes they're a little embarrassed and sometimes they're scared for me. But the difference is I have a radio with me."

Students wish Israel 'Happy Birthday'

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

Israel turned 41 yesterday, and Hillel threw an afternoon party at the Student Union Ballroom to celebrate.

The anniversary, highlighting events held Sunday and last night, featured Israeli folk dancing, music and food, as well as birthday cake and blue and white "Happy Birthday ISRAEL" balloons — matching the Israeli flag's colors.

Also featured was a mural, titled "Make your own peace," which stretched across the ballroom's stage. Personal responses ranged from the simple "Happy birthday Israel" in Hebrew and in English to poetry and artwork.

Hillel President Alisa Berkowitz said the event went "really well," and, as a native of Israel, it had special meaning.

"I miss [Israel] a lot," she said. "It's hard for some of us not to be in Israel on Independence Day."

She said that the country's constant fight for survival has made each independence day exciting.

"The birthday is very exciting because, after 41 years of struggling to survive, it has continued to exist," Berkowitz said.

The apolitical nature of the day's events was a factor in its success, according to Orna Sonnenscheim, a Hillel council member.

"There's been a lot of tension on campus lately with the Palestinian issue," she said. "It's really nice to . . . celebrate the existence of Israel without getting political."

There was also a table with information on trips and exchanges to Israel. Eric Esses, who was at the table, said that there was a heavy turnout of students interested in going to the country. When asked if it was a successful day for him, he said, "It doesn't matter how many people go [to Israel]; if the interest is there,
[the day was successfull]."

Hillel has spent the past year working on the event, but the bulk of the work was spent in the past two months, according to Gary Kabler, the group's religious chairperson. Berkowitz said, "A lot of time and energy and cooperation went into it, but it all paid off."

access Langley is concerned that borderline families who earn just enough not to qualify will be hurt by the increases, he said.

"It does present a number of problems. There's families on tight budgets and these tuition increases are hard to absorb," he said.

Langley also said because tuition increases receive so much news coverage and financial aid increases do not, minority students are discouraged and do not apply believing there is no way to get the needed funding.

"That decreases minority enrollment," he said.

At Tuesday's meeting, the Boston Globe reported that Franklyn Jenifer, chancellor of the Board of Regents, said the board will increase state financial aid eligibility by 3,000 students statewide.

The present budget situation has already forced the University to reduce the size of the incoming freshman class by 300 students.

"I would hope that more students would become angry and direct their anger at the legislature because they feel" students can absorb funding cuts, Langley said.

NCA raffle to save the arts

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

Because this wonderful government of ours feels that our tax money is better spent on rusty missiles and decrepit silos, funding for state budgets has been drastically cut, affecting minor things like education and the arts. Such devastating cutbacks are endangering the existence of the Northampton Center of the Arts that has in the past brought us wonderful and diverse slices of the art world. But thanks to people like Mark Metzger, head of the Northampton Brewery and member of the Board of Directors for the Center of the Arts, the Center will for now continue to exist.

Metzger and his colleagues on the Board of Directors have decided to hold a raffle to raise the funds needed to keep the Center of the Arts alive. The grand prize winner of the drawing will receive a trip for two to Rome with luxurious hotel accommodations and five hundred dollars in spending money. If that wasn't enough, included with the prize is two tickets and backstage passes to the Rome stop of the Paul Simon/Graceland Tour and the chance of meeting Paul Simon. The lucky winner will leave for Rome on June 29 and return on July 6. Metzger is presently investigating the possibility of extending the length of this trip to include the whole summer if a college student wins.

the fact that they have started widebody service from Boston to Rome. The hotel, the concert tickets, and the backstage passes were arranged by the people involved with the Paul Simon/Graceland Tour. Metzger and the Northampton Brewery has generously given the five hundred dollars in spending money. It should be made clear that all money received from the sale of the raffle tickets goes straight to the Center of the Arts and not to advertising or prize expenses.

The raffle tickets are on sale now at Faces and will be on sale at the Campus Center Concourse on Friday, May 12 and Friday, May 19. There are only 1,000 tickets available and they cost twenty dollars a piece. True, that is quite an expensive price to pay for a raffle, but consider the prize that is being offered and, more important, how the proceeds from the sale of these tickets benefit some many people in the community. The drawing will be held at Greene Hall in Northampton on June 11 during the Bonnie Raitt show. Thanks to the people at the Iron Horse, money earned from this show will also benefit the Center of the Arts. If you have any question concerning the raffle, call the Center of the Arts at 584-7327.

Klock's sax fax at Bezanson

The University of Massachusetts Department of Music and dance is sponsoring the seventh annual New England Saxophone Symposium on Saturday, May 13 from 8:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. in Bezanson Recital Hall. Lynn Klock, Associate professor of saxophone and member of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, is coordinating the event.

A full day of activities is planned, including clinics, guest soloists in jazz and classical recitals, and saxophone quartets from New England colleges and universities. At 11 a.m., Lynn Klock will be joined in recital by pianists Nadine Shank and Greg Hayes and the Ancora Chamber Ensemble. At 1:30 p.m., Albert Regni, saxophonist with the New York Philharmonic, Metropolitan Opera and a recording artist for television and radio, will present a clinic and recital.

Representatives from major saxophone manufacturers will be on hand with instruments and information. Advance registration is $12 and $15 on the day of the Symposium. For further information, please call Professor Klock at (413) 545-2810 or 545-2227.

Southwest concert is a whole new can of Phish

By, AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

With the big war horses of the 1960s and 1970s, such as the Rolling Stones, the Who, and the Doobie Brothers covering up their grey hairs, exchanging their orthopedic shoes for Reeboks' and heading back out on the road for major tours this summer, it seems only fitting that the late 1960s blues-boogie band Canned Heat will be headlining this spring's Southwest Concert.

Canned Heat has recorded over 25 albums. That's more than one album for every year since I've been alive. They've played at Woodstock and the Monterey Pop Festival. One of their handful of top ten hits, "Going Up the Country" even made it on the now infamous Freedom Rock album, whose ads have infested our late night TV viewing.

So where has Canned Heat been in the past fifteen or so years? First, co-founder Alan "Blind Owl" Wilson died in 1970 of a drug overdose. The other co-founder, 300 pound singer and harmonica player Bob "Bear" Hite, died in 1981.

Phish

The band was ready to call it quits after Hite's death. Instead, the three remaining members, drummer Adolfo "Fits" de la Parra, guitarist Henry Vestine, and bassist Larry Taylor decided to fulfil their contract by touring Australia. They recruited keyboardist Ronnie Barron and guitarist/harmonica player James T, and hit the road. The band met with so much success that they've been touring Australia and Japan ever since.

Now the revamped Canned Heat have decided to reclaim America. They had a successful West Coast swing in 1986 and are now ready to capture the East. Adolfo de la Parra feels the time is right for a blues resurgence. He thinks people are fed up with the synthesized electronic crap that fills top 40 radio. "In the end of the 80s, you see a comeback of the human element in the music," he said.

Canned Heat will be bringing that human element to the Southwest fields this Saturday with the Burlington, Vermont band Phish. Since Phish's beginnings, their sound has always been uncatagorizable. The closest label you could pin on this band would be the slash filled rock/jazz/funk/hardcore. They play it all, from Led Zeppelin to Frank Zappa and Miles Davis to XTC, with their same unique brilliance.

The band also performs a wide range of original numbers, written by vocalist/guitarist Trey Anastasio, who started writing songs, such as "Golgi Apparatus," when he was twelve years old.

Phish also includes pianist Page McConnell, bassist Mike Gordon, and drummer/trombonist (the ultimate music combination) John Phishman. Their Vermont following is nothing short of huge and they are slowly getting people to notice them all across the country.

The band should prove to be a challenge for the scores of people who so enjoyed the spandexed partier Stevie B at the pond last Sunday. This unpredictable band has a tendency to blend improvizational jazz with classical and blue grass in any one of their songs. They may go off and just jam for 15 minutes, but they do it well. This is a band to can dance to and appreciate for their musical ability.

The Incredible Casuals and a steel band will be rounding out the show, in what, if the skies allow, promises to be the last big party of the year before finals, even if you can't drink there.

IMPORTANT RESIDENCE HALL INFORMATION

It is important for all residents planning to live on-campus for the Fall 1989 semester to remember the following important policies and procedures. Please read this information carefully and be sure you understand and are aware of each of the following obligations. Thank you.

1. RESIDENCE HALL CONTRACT CARDS ARE DUE THURSDAY, MAY 25. As always if you intend to live in the residence halls in the fall, you must return your Residence Hall Contract Card to the Housing Assignment Office before you leave campus for the summer. When you return your Contract Card you will be given a date stamped receipt. make certain you retain this receipt for your records. IF YOU FAIL TO RETURN YOUR RESIDENCE HALL CONTRACT CARD BY MAY 25, 1989, YOUR FALL ASSIGNMENT WILL BE CANCELLED.

2. JUNIOR SENIOR ROOM CONFIRMATION CARDS ARE DUE BY FRIDAY, JUNE 23. Room Confirmation Cards will be mailed to your permanent address during the first week in June if you signed up for a room and signed a Residence Hall Contract Card. These Confirmation Card must be returned to the Housing Assignment Office no later than Friday, June 23, 1989. YOU MUST, FOR YOUR OWN PROTECTION, RETURN YOUR CARD CERTIFIED MAIL RETURN RECEIPT REQUESTED.

3. PAY YOUR FALL FEE BILL BY THE BURSAR'S AUGUST 4, 1989, DUE DATE. As always, financial obligations must be met by all residents who wish to retain their assignments for the upcoming semester. Fall semester fee bills will be mailed to your permanent address in early July. Failure to pay your bill by the due date of August 4th, will immediately cancel your assignment for the Fall.

4. MAKE SURE YOU REMAIN IN GOOD STANDING throughout the summer. If you are withdrawn for ANY reason after the last day of the semester, your residence hall assignment for the fall will be cancelled.

5. RESIDENCE HALLS CLOSE for the Spring semester on Thursday, May 25 at 4:00 p.m. except for graduating Seniors. Make certain that you follow indicated 'check-out' procedures to avoid any unnecessary inconvenience or charges.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Limitations of city living

A few weeks ago, a 28-year-old woman was brutally beaten and raped while she was jogging in New York's Central Park. What was especially shocking was that her attackers were not hardened criminals, they were children.

Lisa Hamelin

When these children were arrested, they showed not the slightest bit of guilt or remorse over their crime. Nobody tried to help the victims when these youths victimized this jogger and a few other innocent people in the park.

This high rate of violence and disregard for others is only one of many reasons why city living is not for me. I would not even want to live in the suburbs. I am a person who treasures privacy, solitude and the right to go walking or jogging around unmolested.

True, there is a slight chance that I'll be attacked on a farm road in Ware or New Braintree, but the chances of being attacked are much less than if I were in Central Park. Besides, most rapists, muggers and associated scum look for an easy-to-subdue victim, not a broad-shouldered woman who has an ornery, powerfully muscled, sixty pound dog on a leash at her side.

I happen to love animals, especially those of the equine and canine type. When I have a place of my own, I want to start the big menagerie that my parents never allowed me to have. I wonder how many apartments in New York or Boston would allow a tenant to keep two horses and five or six dogs.

I hate crowds. When I walk or jog, I like to have the sidewalk or shoulder of the road to myself so I can move with long, unbroken strides. Even at UMass, I tend to get irritated by large, slow-moving groups of people.

If pedestrians traffic at UMass irritates me, think about what crowds in New York or Los Angeles would do to me.

Now, don't get the idea that I'm antisocial, I'm not. I have plenty of friends whom I socialize with, and I someday want to have a husband and children. But there's a limit to being surrounded by other people. I have times when I must be alone, in a place where there are no other people in sight.

I am a writer, and it is almost impossible for me to organize my thoughts when I'm surrounded by a noisy, bustling group. If I had to be surrounded by other people 24 hours a day, I would go berserk.

I don't mean to condemn urban dwellers. I realize that city living is a necessity for some people. Some seem to actually thrive on the crowds, chaos and pollution that is so rampant in most major American cities. However, I could not live in the city if someone was willing to pay me $1 million a year for doing so. I do not mind venturing into the city to go shopping or take in a movie, but living there?

No thanks. I'll always prefer tall trees and herds of Holsteins over tall buildings over gangs of vicious youths.

Lisa Hamelin is a Collegian columnist

Did you want to be a columnist this semester, but just didn't have the time? Are you thinking about writing for us on a regular basis? Or, has the thought of writing for us never entered your mind, because you don't think anyone is interested in what you have to say?

Well, fear not. We are always looking for columnists. Even though it's too late to become a columnist this semester, you can still do it next semester. Just come down and talk to Pam or Meredith for details. Or call us at 545-3500.

A surreal semester passes

Well, kids, it's been a wild and crazy semester here at the University of Massachusetts. Seems like just yesterday I came back to start my fourth semester, and to tell you the truth, I'm going to need a real vacation this summer to recuperate from all the lunatics this madhouse produced in these past few months.

The semester kicked off with a new and improved version of censorship. Write something the Ayatollah doesn't like, and he'll pay some brain-rotted religious maniac to pump you full of more holes than a chain link fence. Poor Salman Rushdie. It's one thing to actually ban something, but to threaten to kill the poor guy . . . Maybe I should be thankful I'm from a Catholic family (!); all the Catholics ever do is give you a colossal guilt trip, or the Pope might excommunicate you.

Pamela McCarthy

We had even more controversy over Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz vs. the campus right-wing. Everyone outside of the Student Government Association (and even some members of that, I suspect) were sick of the whole hot tamale. But some insisted on blocking them from office, and others insisted on keeping them in office. Who cared if it meant never letting the senate do anything useful? I've heard of filibustering, but these feats of oxygen consumption were superhuman.

Activists built Cutback City, a group of ramshackle huts made from discarded boards. The decay of Cutback City is supposed to symbolize the condition of state colleges and universities. Students did a very acrobatic attitude flip-flop between the beginning and the end of the semester. First, these activists were noble, and fighting for a good cause. Then, the students got bored with the cutback problems, proclaimed the city an eyesore, wanted it torn down, and called the activists "radicals" and "yahoos." Talk about being fickle.

UMass was also the site for a new, innovative approach to entertainment. It's called "Improvised Wrestlemania." The first match was between the Spartacists and the Republican Club. The Republicans went to a Spartacist League gathering, and neither group liked each other's faces. So they decided to bash them in. Cute. Headbutting was the great move of that particular brawl.

However, the UMass Department of Public Safety was not to be topped by a long shot. When protestors were hauled off to jail in a PVTA bus, there were claims of innocent bystanders being manhandled by the cops, who were allegedly using their billy-clubs to shove passers-by away from the road.

There were anti-porn protests abound, with feminists yelling "misogyny" and others yelling "censorship." A few morons informed us that if these women weren't so ugly, they too could pose for a Playboy centerfold, like UConn student Allison Decker. According to them, these women were just jealous. Hey fellas, if you weren't so ugly, you'd have a real sex life. (And by the way, don't scream "censor" at me, because I don't argue against the right to be published, even for disgusting, insipid trash.)

The students exerted some energy and wrote to legislators about the budget cuts. It's nice to know that you don't have to be a rabid professional protestor to get the job done. We gave a nice, well-deserved migraine to the people on Beacon Hill.

Recently, several campus buildings were taken over by protestors who want to get rid of military-funded research at UMass. People from both sides would tell me how the Collegian was biased and/or lying on the side of the protestors or the military. Make up your minds, folks. You can't have it both ways.

I'm going to Sheffield, England for the year, starting this fall. I've been warned of terrorism, plane crashes, violent soccer games, and Rushdie riots. I'm going to show these bearers of doom this column. Insanity? I'm used to it.

A narrow-minded concert review

I had a really long weekend, and I was in no mood to put up with Graeme Thomson's narrow-mindedness ("Cap fits Shinehead at the pond," May 8). I had a great time at the pond concert. Maybe I'm just a loser for having missed the musical greatness of Shinehead, but I woke up late. Yes, I live in Southwest, and was looking forward to seeing the Hooters. Since they played a lot of new stuff, I was less than enthralled, but it was fun. (Yes, it is OK to have fun at a concert — I left my heavy-handed political beliefs back at Coolidge for the day.) Say what you want about Stevie B., since I will be among the last to buy his album, but you have to admit, he got the crowd going. I now believe you can actually have a great time dancing to "duh-duh-ti-pow" beat. Maybe the day-glow got to you. Maybe you should visit Southwest more often and build up a tolerance.

To quote a close friend, "Tom-Tom Club was awesome, and I've never heard them before." My friends and I went down in the mud, and danced until it hurt. The fact that you left after "Genius of Love" makes you sound ridiculous. How can you review a band you didn't even see? Of course they sounded like the Talking Heads — Chris and Tina were half of the band. Every band has its own sound, and some of us up here are a little more forgiving, since they are a relatively new touring band. It's especially narrow-minded to criticize them for the way they look. Those of us who went to the concert expecting to have a good time weren't disappointed.

The Holocaust: anniversary of a tragedy

Last week was Holocaust Memorial Week, a time to remember, a time for regret, a time to lament, a time to recollect.

Eleven million people died at the hands of the Nazi nightmare some 45 years ago. Today, the pain and suffering is still vividly felt. The memories have not tarnished or faded with time, even for Samuel Natansohn who, as a little boy, witnessed some of the most ghastly acts in the history of the world, acts that occurred right in his own backyard.

Samuel was born in Poland and was ten years old in 1939. With the German invasion, Samuel and his family fled West. They found a place to secretly live — in the back room of a baker's house.

Within two weeks of the German occupation, the S.S. began knocking on doors looking for Jews.

In the beginning, Jews were not allowed to go to school or walk certain streets. They had to wear patches sewn on their clothing, patches which invited daily beatings. Many were rounded up for slavery. Samuel's father was amongst the chosen. He would come home from a 16-hour workday bruised and beaten.

In 1942, conditions worsened after a ghetto was formed. Jews from all over were rounded up and transported to the Rzescow ghetto. Completely cut off from the rest of the world, 24,000 people lived within a few square blocks. People died every day.

On July 7, 1942, the Final Solution swung into full force. The ghetto was surrounded, and the Jews were deported. Those who worked for the German war machine and their families could stay. Samuel's mother was among those workers. Of the 24,000 in the ghetto, about 200 remained behind.

Scott Green

No one knew where the Jews were being taken. They hoped that they were somewhere else, somewhere safe. They didn't know about the ovens and crematoria. Samuel saw most of his family and all of his childhood friends disappear in front of his eyes. Those who didn't move quickly enough were shot and killed.

The ghetto was formed into a labor camp. There was a weeding out of the weaker people and those who couldn't work were killed.

In the midst of murder and madness however, Samuel saw that humanity did prevail. He told of a time when a child picked for extermination was crying hysterically. An older woman volunteered to go with the child to comfort her.

Acts of altruism, heroism and courage were not uncommon. People risked their lives to save others. One day, a Polish woman offered to help Samuel and his family to escape. It worked. They lived in the woman's cellar for four months with no daylight and little food.

Because of retreating German soldiers, Samuel had to move. The woman's sister offered to hide them, knowing that if they were found out she would be shot.

Samuel was fortunate to find caring individuals, willing to put their lives on the line to help others. It was through these people that he was able to survive.

Even when the rest of the world knew what was happening, they didn't do anything to stop it. The world didn't care. There was no help from the outside, not even a word of courage.

Because of the indifference and lack of action, resistance was difficult. The Jews resisted where they could, but with dogs rounding up the Jews in one place, machine guns at the corners and tanks nearby, it was next to impossible without help.

The moral is to stand up and take notice, and to do something. Do not disregard threats. In Mein Kampf, no one believed Hitler when he wrote that Jews needed to be eradicated. Look, listen, hear, think and act! The indifference of onlookers perpetuated things, as it does today. Do not let others think and act for you.

Goodbye to my lovely locks

"You may have heard in your high school science class that hair is dead material. There is no pain when you cut it. Fool! Two minutes after the hair is gone, regret turns to tears, and tears turn into a mourning period."
—Humorist Erma Bombeck

I'm not a radical or a hippie. I'm not an androgynous dork. Hair, to me, is not something to be used to make a political statement.

Darren Garnick

With all that brushed aside, hair is a natural extension of the human body. Interrupting or altering hair growth may be fashionable, but it is morally wrong. I resent the scissors-waving zealots who wish to treat my head like an arts-and-crafts project.

Yet, every three months or so I silence my conscience and submit myself to the blade. I hold out as long as I can, but the fear of being stigmatized as a "mophead" is too strong. When friends start dropping subtle comments like "you need a haircut," I know it is time.

And there is never a shortage of volunteers to do the job. Mention in a casual conversation the possibility of getting a haircut, and suddenly throngs of comedian-barbers offer their services free of charge. "I'll do a great job, seriously," they assure me with a smile. "I'll be really careful. I promise."

Students with a hair-cutting fetish have even used the Collegian classifieds to seduce young subjects for practice: "Wanted: Looking for people who are interested in having their hair cut for hair cutting demonstration class."

Back in the elementary school days, my mother once dragged me to a hairdressing school for a trim. The prices were reasonable, but there was something about the sign over the sink that bothered me. "We are not Responsible for any Mistakes Made by our Students," it read.

Since then, I've never been the same. Hydraulic lift chairs spark nightmares of mad scientists and demented experiments. Sitting in the barber's chair is as demeaning as sitting in the dentist's. Both have a set of metal tools at their disposal. Both utilize electrical appliances. Jack up the chair and the human maintenance project will quietly allow the modifications.

Of course, it is all psychological. After I suffer through a haircut, I feel like a different person. I'm a conformist ready to enroll in military school. My arguing skills weaken. My sarcastic, wisecracking abilities are stifled. When my hair is cut, my strengths disappear. Just like Sampson.

Each time I crawl back to Delilah, I tell myself things will be different. But I fail to realize that he or she who ignores haircut history, is doomed to repeat it.

I trusted "Delilah" at the beginning of this semester. "Most guys don't like long curls," she said laughing, as I saw them drop on my lap. When the ordeal was over, it looked like my hair was painted on my head. I paid thirteen dollars to look like a goon. Ironically, the name of the place was "Image."

Last Sunday, I summoned up the courage to be delocked once more. Denouncing hairstylists as "quacks," "frauds," and "charlatans," I went to the chair with no empty illusions of walking away looking normal. In a few weeks, my hair would regenerate to an acceptable appearance.

It so happens that Sunday was a charity "cut-a-thon." The J.C. Penney styling team donated their time to benefit the Cummington Ambulance Fund. Hey, if I'm going to be humiliated, it might as well be for a good cause.

I was pleasantly surprised with an "invisible haircut" — not too short, not too long. Maybe hairstylists aren't that bad after all.

Allied in the fight against racism

White Allies Against Racism isn't a well known group here. We consist of 11 White people that met six consecutive weeks beginning in February. To many, our name is curious sounding.

We are just White people eager to learn about ourselves and examine individual, institutional and cultural racism, as we develop action plans to make a difference in the constant struggle against racism. We are allies for people of color, all colors.

Jodi-Lyn Blanche

During the six week period, each member was offered the opportunity for intense self-growth, educating ourselves by defining racism as a White problem and by studying the experiences and history related to people of color that is often omitted or distorted in textbooks.

These seminars demanded us to reflect upon our own experiences of growing up racially, defining the position and responsibilities of being an ally, learning proper terms and language, developing a White identity while attaining non-racist behavior and thinking.

The time spent within the safe environment was illuminating. I was driven to explore my own history and recognize how it was growing up as a White person with the values stressed on me about how to be a "good" White person.

As I confronted and conquered my fears by examining my own learned racism, my feelings of powerlessness ended. Ways to teach about racism in a non-threatening manner were recognized.

A sense of White consciousness, White pride and White identity was created within myself. Often, these terms are incorrectly mistaken for thoughts of White Supremacy. Do not be alarmed, for these terms have expanded my awareness and heart. They have redefined what I like about being White as the feelings of guilt disappeared and my strength to create change increased.

To eliminate racism, racism needs to be unlearned and emotionally and intellectually. Many teachings must be re-evaluated before acceptance. One must use one's mind and energy to react to, confront, study and learn from racist textbooks, racist media, racial jokes, racial slurs, racist attitudes and stereotypes.

To be completely passive helps create an accepting atmosphere for racism. Whites have set up a system that allows racism. It is a White person's problem, yet everyone must work together.

Through White Allies, I am making an effort to reject all forms of racism and to support cultural diversity. People are on all different levels of understanding and confronting racism, that is the reason for the complexity of the problem. Do with what you have: resist a racial joke, inform someone of your beliefs, write a letter, support actions that are fighting racism, or become involved with an anti-racist group.

Please do not be blind. We are all equal as people, even though our cultures and ethnicities are different. Many believe that equality means sameness. Actually, equality means the acceptance of differences. Recognize and appreciate each other's cultural differences as well as similarities. We can help our world improve to be a safe structure and support system for all.

The meetings for White Allies Against Racism are finished for the semester, yet our work is no where near completion. We are allies for all people of color, committing ourselves to end racism while personally growing in the process.

Action and support is needed now. Get involved, take a stand, fight racism and demand to live in a more compassionate society.

The written word can divide the sexes

In a Collegian article, former University of Massachusetts professor Roger Libby asserted that male and female sex roles "should be more open to interpretation and modification" ("Sex educator sees change in roles," May 2). I choose to argue that these "sex roles" have been subjected to over interpretation, excessive analysis, and dissected to the point where men and women are modeled as two opposing, warring factions.

Karen Placzek

As of late, there has been a large influx of "how to" books on the shelves designed to offer instructions on how to love a man and understanding women, as well as magazine articles on "keeping your man faithful" and my personal favorite, "tricking a man into loving you." Why do I have the feeling that the woman who manages to "get a man" in this way (if it is even possible) may not be headed for the most open, honest and stable of relationships? What has resulted is a game of deception and trickery where the target is a partner and the coveted prize is the "catch." These books construct insecurities, assuming men and women are incapable of understanding each other and that the only salvation they have is the aid of their text. These books also manage to categorize the entire male and female gender into two separate lumps. Have the authors of these books had divine revelations as to what the whole male population is looking for in a woman, or vice versa?

These stereotypes also extend to arguments concerning sexism and exploitation as well. In this same Profile article, Peg Aloi stated that women see Playboy as exploitation by men. While certainly not justifying the existence of Playboy in society, I find it difficult to comprehend how she can generalize in this manner. Did every member of the male population stand up, raise their hand and say, "Yes, I vote for the exploitation of women?" If it can be said that Playboy is exploitation by men, then isn't Playgirl exploitation of men by women? No, it is not men and it's not women responsible for this exploitation, rather it's society as a whole, a society that knows what sells. It is also the same society which can get away with the production and selling of an innumeration of these "how to" books.

In the search for equality and appreciation between the sexes, it would seem that the very sources that are trying to achieve harmony between them are in fact creating a more defined division. Society has to stop looking at men and women as conflicting forces, two distinct groups in which members of their respective divisions are all interchangeable models. Fundamentally, before we are women, before we are men, we're all people. We must look at each person individually, because the combination of hopes, fears, and needs of each member of the human population cannot simply be split into two groups. It's time we stopped relying on Cosmo or GQ to better understand individuals of the opposite sex, and instead concentrated on just relating to individuals.

Battling for minority empowerment

It's 5:30 on Wednesday. I just checked the campus center schedule to see where the Third World Caucus meeting is being held. As I sit in my chair, letting my legs rest, I feel how worn I am. I just finished a full day of classes and now I will be stuck in an hour and half meeting. Someone brings up the subject of Coke on campus, the chair takes a debate list. I think about how much work it would be if this umbrella minority organization committed itself to kicking Coke, the biggest soft drink investor in South Africa, off of our campus. There is no conclusion, the debate continues.

Superiority complex woes

We at the Union Program Council are very sad. It seems we managed to offend Jason Talerman ("Brain has it over bone in the mind of Yeasthead," May 8) by booking bands for the Spring Concert which he dislikes. Oh, please forgive us Jason.

We are also very ashamed to have outfitted all the people who worked the show for free with tee-shirts. Next year we shall certainly consult your holiness as to how to get people to work for absoloutely nothing.

We shall also consult you to invest in the 10,000 spectators the necessary taste required to enjoy the acts you like, not they. Imagine the gall of everyone who enjoyed the Spring Concert. Next year, we shall all ask you to bestow your good graces upon your unwashed backs.

Mostly, we shall certainly address the most important issue. That is, of course, the matter of your well-earned photo pass. Next year, we shall definitely send you your backstage pass, so you won't have to show up at the back gate and waste your time arguing about why you should have it, with people who couldn't care less about your petty, snivelling ego trips.

I could be out tossing a frisbee after a relaxed dinner. But then I remember the racial brawl in 1986, the beating in Sylvan last year, the racist and anti-Semitic notes, the racist homophobic Minuteman newspaper . . . and the list could go on and on.

I think about Student Government and its control of $2 million. I think about how the '-isms' do not always manifest themselves in blatant attacks. I think about the institutional attacks which go unnoticed. A budget and finance committee determines which groups get what monies based on a hearing where there are many questions and answers. Some groups come and go with few questions asked. Others are hounded.

"Why do you need $40 for travel for the Senator to come and speak about reparations for slavery? Can't he take a bus?"

How can a Senator take a bus? Why haven't they suggested this to other group's speakers? The committees are filled with "unfriendly" votes. Some are prejudiced, others are narrow minded and some just ignorant. But the debate continues, "I do not think a speaker should get travel money if he is already being paid to come and speak here. This is a matter of principle."

Principle? Is withholding $40 from the $30,000 the finance committee controls really principle? Where was their principle when the paper for which many of them write offended people based on their race, religion, national origins and sexual orientation? If this principle is the focus of withholding $40, why does the debater not expand on that point? "Besides, this man is crazy. He's a racist. This is the most ridiculous thing I've ever heard." But what is the real issue here?

Senator Owens eventually came to campus, no thanks to the finance committee. But is it crazy to want students to have the chance to hear the designer of the most recent reparations argument? Is this Senator racist, or are the people who use double standards of criteria for allocating student money racist? This happened this semester. It wasn't in the Collegian. It wasn't talked about, yet it happens more often than people think. This situation occurs around issues concerning minorities and the underrepresented. It has happened when the Third World Caucus tried to bring a speaker about institutional racism, and will happen again.

Groups can ask for money for a fun cultural event and there will be no debate on their $900 budget. But when the same group asks for money for a speaker, principles over giving $40 arise.

A silencing of thought is going on. The groups representing the historically oppressed communities are being silenced because they cannot program to have their points of view heard. Status quo-minded finance committees silence them and keep their opinions from being heard by making sure that not enough money is raised to bring their speakers to campus.

They think to themselves, "As long as you people bring something we like, we will give you money. We don't care about your nationalism, your pain or your solution — just be the entertainers that you are and stick with cultural events."

Minority empowerment is being tested. The battle is being lost. Get involved, for I know why I give of my time in the Third World Caucus. But I ask, is an hour and a half that much of a commitment against a lifetime of injustice?

by spiritual healing. But then they see that if something goes wrong, or when it goes to a certain point, then they get indicted for manslaughter."

Klieman said the Legislature needs to rewrite and clarify the laws concerning holistic care for children before anyone is indicted on manslaughter charges.

John Kiernan, a special prosecutor representing the state, argued that it is every parent's duty to care for the children. He said that a jury should have the opportunity to decide if the Twitchells fulfilled that obligation.

But Klieman said it was unfair to ask a lay jury to decide a case based on religious beliefs when the laws are unclear.

Wilkins is expected to decide within two weeks whether to send the case to the full court or remand it to trial. If a trial is set, it is not expected to start until the fall.

The Twitchells did not appear in court yesterday.

According to police reports, the Twitchells' son, Robyn, became feverish and lethargic in early April 1986. The Twitchells contacted a church practitioner, who came to their home to pray for the boy's recovery.

On the evening of his death, the boy developed convulsions and lost consciousness and vital signs. The boy's father first called a funeral director, who told him to contact the police. The boy was pronounced dead at Carney Hospital in Boston.

Klieman has said the official cause of death was complications from a bowel obstruction. She said it stemmed from a congenital birth defect.

The Church of Christ, Scientist, is located in Boston and the denomination has about 3,200 branches worldwide.

CELEBRATE DIVERSITY

The retaining wall opposite the east entrance of the Campus Center will soon be the site of a mural to commemorate last year's Civility Week and create a permanent message that addresses the importance of continued civility awareness and progress. The idea for a civility mural came from Environmental Design major Jon Satz. A competition among students in the Art, Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning, and Afro-American Studies departments was conducted by the Arts Council, the Graduate Art Students Association (GASA,) and UARTS, the Art Department's undergraduate art students organization. Design proposals were juried by students from the Art and Landscape Architecture departments and the Third World Caucus, faculty, and staff. The design of a graduate art student, Jonathan Kohrman, was selected. He will start to paint the mural in early May. A series of scenes will depict University community members from many constituencies socializing, working, and learning together. University members may actually serve as models for some of the figures in the mural. During its creation we encourage you to stop and speak with the artist.

For further information, contact the Arts Council, 125 Herter Hall, 545-0202.

Historic cl will rebuild from ashes

By Richard Sasson
The Patriot Ledger

WESTWOOD — Dominic Marinelli of Walpole, president of the 92-year-old Norfolk Golf Club on East Street, vowed yesterday to rebuild the clubhouse that was destroyed in a $100,000, three-alarm fire over the weekend.

Marinelli said the golf course will reopen in a couple of days and the clubhouse will be rebuilt.

"It's a disappointment," he said. "The building has been there a lot of years and there's a lot of history to it. But we'll come out of it. The club will survive like it has in the past."

No members were in the clubhouse during the fire which started near the club's function room, leaving a section of the shop and a section of the locker room standing, John J. Sheehy said.

NEW BEDFORD — The only airline that runs regular flights from the city to and from Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket plans to withdraw its service in September, but federal law says another airline has to take over before the pullout.

Eastern Express/Provincetown-Boston Airlines, owned by Bar Harbor Airways Inc., will withdraw at New Bedford Municipal Airport because of passenger demand, higher landing fees and competition in Boston and LaGuardia airports in New York and the need to purchase new planes, it announced Thursday.

Soup company settles ad case

CAMDEN, N.J. (AP) — Campbell Soup Co. settled a year-old dispute yesterday with nine states including Massachusetts over advertised claims that the company's soups were healthy as well as "Mm! Mm! Good."

Under terms of a court settlement, the nation's largest soup producer, agreed to pay the states $35,000 each and to change certain advertising practices, said James H. Moran, a company spokesman.

"We're not accepting any guilt and they're not giving any," Moran said. "This was a settlement that we could live with."

The agreement does not affect a complaint filed against Campbell in January by the Federal Trade Commission, which accused the company of overstating the health benefits of its chicken noodle soup.

Campbell advertisements misled consumers by failing to alert them of the soup's sodium content, the federal agency charged.

Campbell halted the advertising campaign challenged by the nine states a year ago, but Moran said the company plans to fight the FTC complaint.

"We're standing by the ad and we're going to court and prove our case," said Moran.

Campbell, which sells about 5 billion cans of soup a year, garnering about 65 percent of the $2.2 billion retail soup market in the United States, has come under heavy

"HOW I MADE $18,000 FOR COLLEGE BY WORKING WEEKENDS."

When my friends and I graduated from high school, we all took part-time jobs to pay for college.

They ended up in car washes and hamburger joints, putting in long hours for little pay.

Not me. My job takes just one weekend a month and two weeks a year. Yet, I'm earning $18,000 for college.

Because I joined my local Army National Guard.

They're the people who help our state during emergencies like hurricanes and floods. They're also an important part of our country's military defense.

So, since I'm helping them do such an important job, they're helping me make it through school.

As soon as I finished Advanced Training, the Guard gave me a cash bonus of $2,000. I'm also getting another $5,000 for tuition and books, thanks to the New GI Bill.

Not to mention my monthly Army Guard paychecks. They'll add up to more than $11,000 over the six years I'm in the Guard.

And if I take out a college loan, the Guard will help me pay it back—up to $1,500 a year, plus interest.

It all adds up to $18,000—or more—for college for just a little of my time. And that's a heck of a better deal than any car wash will give you.

THE GUARD CAN HELP PUT YOU THROUGH COLLEGE, TOO. SEE YOUR LOCAL RECRUITER FOR DETAILS, CALL TOLL-FREE 800-638-7600,* OR MAIL THIS COUPON.

criticism from the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

Since 1983, the Washington-based consumer interest group has twice asked the FTC to review Campbell's advertising and sodium content claims.

"The amount of sodium and salt in the soups is a serious concern," said Charles Mitchell, a staff attorney for Science in the Public Interest. "Most of their soups are so high in sodium that the increased risk of high blood pressure from the soups might outweigh any other positive benefits that are or are not in the soups."

The agreement announced yesterday ended a dispute that began last June. The states' attorneys general contended that Campbell's ads made high fiber claims about soups which alone are not a good source of calcium, and "generally mischaracterized the health effect of Campbell's soup products," said Wisconsin Attorney General Don Hanaway.

"Campbell misrepresented the calcium content of its tomato, cream of mushroom and cream of celery soups by claiming in its advertisements that one serving of theses soups provides '10 percent of your daily requirement,' when in fact, the calcium is not in the soup but in the milk that the soup can optionally be prepared with," Hanaway said.

Campbell "also falsely implied that its bean and pea soups can prevent 'some kind of cancer' by not sufficiently stressing in the advertisements that only a diet high in fiber and low in fat has been proven to help reduce colorectal cancer and not other types of cancer," Hanaway said.

As part of the settlement, Campbell agreed to change certain advertising practices that were disputed.

"This settlement helps sent the message to food marketers that they cannot claim falsely that a product is high in desirable nutrients," said Minnesota Attorney General Hubert Humphrey III.

Wisconsin worked with attorneys general of California, Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New York and Texas in reaching the settlement.

"This type of action by this many states is unprecedented," said Mitchell.

Campbell voluntarily halted the advertising campaign which focused on the theme "Soup is Good Food" in early 1988, Moran said. The company resumed using the theme: "Mm! Mm! Good," which had not been used since the 1960s he said.

In 1986, Campbell spent more than $200 million on advertising, Moran said. Current figures were not available, he said.

Funding cuts may postpone highway killings probe

NEW BEDFORD (AP) — A grand jury hearing on evidence connected with the deaths of nine women whose bodies have been found along area highways may be postponed because of state funding cuts.

"There's only so many things you can do in one eight-hour period of time," said Jim Martin, a spokesman for the district attorney.

Martin said most of the grand jury subpoenas have been served at night and on weekends because the witnesses — primarily street people — have been hard to find.

"These people just are not findable during the day. We have to cater to their schedules," he said.

Troopers investigating the slaying of nine women found along or near three New Bedford area highways since July have run up thousands of overtime hours trying, often late at night, to track leads in the case.

The clampdown on overtime means a stop to the late night investigations that have produced some of the investigation's best clues, Martin said.

"It continues to put us further and further behind. Every day that we lose, we can't get back," he said.

State senators on Tuesday approved $50,000 in reimbursements to district attorney's office for overtime expenses spent more than a month ago. The sum was included in a $71.4 million deficiency budget enacted by the Senate following approval of the budget last week by the Senate Ways and Means Committee.

The Legislature has not approved the $2.1 million in emergency overtime pay for troopers throughout the state until June 30, the end of the fiscal year.

MR. PRESIDENT, FIRST OFF, I GOTTA TELL YOU I'M A HUGE FAN OF YOUR FILM WORK! "KNUTE ROCKNE"? "TOUR DE FORCE!" "BEN-HUR"? JUST OUT OF CONTROL!
WAS I IN "BEN-HUR"?
WERE YOUR GET OUTA HERE! BUT THE THING OF IT IS SEE, YOU'VE GOT THIS B-MOVIE REP, SO WE GOTTA TURN THAT AROUND, OKAY?
HOW DO WE DO THAT? BY MOVING CAUTIOUSLY. BY TAKING SMALL, HIGHLY FEATURED ROLES. A JACK NICHOLSON KINDA DEAL. AT LEAST UNTIL YOU GET YOUR CHOPS BACK. THE IMPORTANT THING IS TO PLAY TO YOUR STRENGTHS!
UM...LIKE WHICH ONES?
WELL, FOR INSTANCE, WE KNOW YOU'RE COMFORTABLE WORKING WITH ANIMALS, RIGHT?

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) An unpleasant situation comes to a head. You are relieved to have it behind you. Be discreet or a romantic relationship could suffer. A family secret is revealed. Visit a Capricorn. That person will come to your aid. Curb a tendency to overreact.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Travel plans may not materialize. Set your sights on a future date and go then. A promotion may surprise a lot of people. You are more sensitive to criticism than usual.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Keep your ambitions within reasonable bounds. Passions run deep. Make a lasting, favorable impression at work by attending to details. New alliances are possible. Contact those behind the scenes.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) An authority figure may test your loyalty today. Just be yourself. It is OK to gamble when the stakes are low. A competitor will turn out to be a good friend.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Economic shifts help the bottom line in business. Your career gets a welcome boost from someone working behind the scenes. A chance encounter turns your thoughts to romance. Follow your heart.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Real estate improvements help you strike a better deal. Concentrate on your professional interests and obligations. Social activities add spice to your day. Vacation travel is best postponed. Spruce up your home.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Your special rapport with someone puts you in a position to get what you want now. You are adept at providing information others need. A new partner makes this evening delightful.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Take your time when making money decisions. Pass up social engagements in favor of business.

Mate or partner gives you food for thought. Only you can determine your priorities.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Mingling socially with important people could lead to new sources of income. Listen closely to the needs of loved ones. Happiness follows. A good time to sign contracts. Read the fine print.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Revise a timetable and you will have money when you need it. Clear away paperwork and double-check accounting figures. Romance is touch-and-go. Play a waiting game if unsure of partner's feelings.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Polish your image by putting your communication talents to work. Give your family's financial security top priority when making business and employment decisions. New spiritual insights reassure you. Your confidence grows.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) The topic of money dominates your day. You could be tempted to spend a large amount for something you have long desired. Think before you act. Avoid putting all your eggs in one basket.

■ Aprile: a freshman sensation

hockey and basketball (for which she was named to the Binghamton area All-Metro team), and in four years of varsity softball, Afton never finished lower than in third place in the state tournament. She tossed 32 no-hitters and 44 shutouts in her career, while compiling a record of 87-8.

It all added up to being named the Binghamton Press and Sun Bulletin Athlete of the Year last spring.

Good blood lines (her father coached nationally competitive summer touring teams) and great high school stats earned her the attention of college coaches early and often. Come graduation, South Carolina and UConn had their feet in the door, but UMass offered both a well-established softball program and an equally reputable School of Management.

"At first I picked schools just for softball, and I didn't really think about the academics," recalled Aprile, the salutarian of her senior class. "Then when I [visited], I realized I've got to look at that too. UMass is the best mixture of both."

The numbers pretty much speak for themselves, but Aprile's attitude cannot be measured by box scores and media guides. She is aggressive and competitive on a softball diamond, almost dangerously so.

During a 1-0 shutout performance against the University of Vermont last week, for example, Aprile faced slugger Kristen Shaeffer in the fourth inning. With a runner on first in what was then a scoreless game, Shaeffer mashed a fastball back up the middle. Instinctively, Aprile reached out and caught the ball with her bare right hand.

"I'm not trying to set an example or anything ... everybody on our team is that way, you just accept it and you play," she said.

If it hurt, no one will ever know. "You have to interrogate Holly to find out what's wrong," said Sortino. "She needs to learn that when you don't know your own limitations, you don't really know the difference between something that could come back to hurt you and something that's just sore.

"She needs to control her lack of patience with herself. It sometimes blocks her from getting to her goals, she gets so frustrated."

Aprile agrees, to a point. "I'm not a very patient person," she said. "I don't verbalize a lot of things, I'm not real vocal.

"But I'm working on that." "

Aprile would like to brush up a couple other facets of her game as well. Besides adding a rising fastball to her standard straight heater, she said, "I have work to do on my batting, in being more disciplined at the plate."

Not that anyone's complaining, of course. "I'm just glad she's on my side," said Sortino. "I like her right the way she is."

Viola familiar with early-season woes

BOSTON (AP) — In 1987, he was the World Series MVP. In 1988, he was the American League's Cy Young Award winner.

But Frank Viola of the Minnesota Twins knows all about baseball adversity, particularly early season disappointment.

As a rookie in 1983, Viola went through seven starts and one relief appearance before winning his first game on May 18.

This year, with the hometown cheers turning to jeers, he was 0-5 in seven starts before beating the Boston Red Sox 6-2 Tuesday night in Fenway Park.

"Just getting No. 1 takes a load off," said Viola. "It's been a little frustrating at times."

How bad was his start? Well, if he goes 23-2 the rest of the season, he will match his 24-7 record of 1988.

"Going a month into the season without a win was a little difficult," he said. "This was the most losses I've ever had at the beginning of a season, but I've had slow starts before. I think that helped me because I knew I could get through it.

"You go through periods like this in your career and hopefully it will make you stronger in the long run."

Ironically, Viola's five losses all have been at Minnesota's Metrodome, where he had been 23-2 in 30 starts since May 22, 1987.

And the slump began during a bitter contract dispute in which he threatened to defect as a free agent in the fall. He finally relented and signed a $7.9 million contract for three years on April 19.

As he lost, the hometown fans let Viola know what they thought of his performance in a year in which he will receive $3.5 million — $2.4 million base pay and a $1.1 million signing bonus.

"Can you blame them?" Viola said when asked about the boos. "People pay their money. If they boo, they boo my performance, not me as an individual. They pay good money to come to the park and they expect a good performance, so I live with that."

Viola, who has a 105-86 lifetime record, knew he'd break into the 1989 victory column eventually. And a shot at the Red Sox was a big boost.

"The last three or four times I thought I threw real well," he said. "It was just a matter of one pitch here or one pitch there that lost them for me. But, yes, I think my success against the Red Sox in the past helped."

He also was unhappy with another effect in his slump.

Spring is a fine season for Aprile

Freshman stars in softball

By SAM SILVERSTEIN

In the first game of their late March homecoming against top-ranked Princeton and arch-rival University of Connecticut, the Minutewomen had apparently lost the services of their starting pitcher on a freak foul ball that went astray.

One hour -- and five fresh stitches -- later, Aprile was on the mound against the Huskies, grimacing her way through eight innings of four-hit ball. UMass won 2-1, and Aprile awoke the next morning with a blinding shiner and Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week honors.

"That confirmed my belief," recalled UMass coach Elaine Sortino, "that Holly is an animal. She's like a kamikaze kid the way she plays the game."

Aprile is a freshman. She has been the catalyst for this year's youth heavy softball squad, leading the Minutewomen (32-16) into this weekend's Atlantic 10 tournament at Rutgers, where they are in position to steal an NCAA bid. UMass has simply caught fire in the second half of the season, winning 23 of its last 26; the fact that Aprile's own numbers have grown proportionately has everything to do with it.

On Tuesday Aprile beat Adelphi ace Chris Gage in eight innings to record her 20th win of the season (against nine losses), tying the UMass record. She's won 14 of her last 15 decisions. On the season she's collected nine shutouts while whittling a 1.22 earned run average, batted .279, and leads the team in runs (22), hits (43), and RBIs (tied with Jen Miller for 18).

Aprile shuts up when asked to describe the contents of her trophy case, saying "I don't think about those things. . . please don't write about that stuff." That would leave a lot of empty space, however.

She's been named A-10 Pitcher of the Week four times, and recently became the first player in the history of that award to win both it and Player of the Week at the same time.

At Afton (N.Y.) High School, Aprile lettered in field

Freshman pitcher Holly Aprile has performed like a veteran for the Minutewomen this season.

Closing the book

Fact: The University of Massachusetts baseball team has seven fewer players than they did a week ago.

Unfortunately, that may be the only thing set in stone with regard to the Minutemen.

I have received several responses to an article I wrote in yesterday's Collegian about the fact the seven players were either kicked off or quit the baseball team.

One player misrepresented in the article was sophomore pitcher Doug Dubiel. UMass head coach Mike Stone said Dubiel had a bad arm, and Dubiel could not be reached for comment before yesterday's article was published.

Matt Gerke

Yesterday afternoon, Dubiel said he left the team under a mutual agreement with Stone. Dubiel is having arm problems, and plans to transfer to Cornell University next year.

Dubiel says, those two things considered, he spoke with Stone, and both agreed it would be better for Dubiel not to finish the season.

Some of the facts provided by the ex-players were called into question, and a lot of second- and third-hand information is being passed.

The story was written because the fact that a team lost seven players is news. I've listened to both sides a lot within the past two days. The stories from both sides don't match and, unfortunately, it seems there is no way to find out the truth.

What I do know is that I'm not going to spend the rest of the semester as a vehicle for both sides to call each other names.

Here is the final word from both sides, as well as Stone, and this is the last that will be written by me about the situation:

In yesterday's article, Stone said he kicked two players off and the others left on their own accord. The ex-players disputed that, saying they had been disciplined for reasons they felt were inappropriate -- such as not wearing colored socks on the team bus.

The players off the team stand by yesterday's article, according to Steve Kern, a former co-captain who, along with Mike Chambers, was kicked off the team by Stone.

Senior co-captain Dave Telgheder, who is still with the team, spoke for his teammates yesterday, saying, "Two players [Kern and Chambers] were kicked off the team, the other five left on their own. The players that got kicked off had been warned and one got a second chance [Kern had been kicked off for two games earlier in the season].

"The entire team is behind the program and Coach Stone, and what the other players said in no way reflects what we think."

Stone said, "It's unfortunate that the players that are no longer on the team said those things. It only proves that my actions were appropriate."

When a team as successful as the Minutemen were last year experiences the type of season they have this year, there is bound to be disappointment.

With yesterday's rainout, the team concluded a frustrating season with a 17-27 record.

Fortunately, all three parties involved (coaches, players, and ex-players) appear to want to end this, and I know I do.

Dubiel said, "I can't say if either side is wrong because I don't know the whole story. It's really none of my business."

It's too bad more people can't have that attitude.

A newspaper is no place for hearsay and that is why, as far as the Collegian is concerned, the subject is closed.

Men's basketball signs another recruit

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The recruiting class of 1989 continues to grow for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team.

Yesterday, head coach John Calipari announced that he had signed his fifth recruit, 6-foot-7, 205-pound Harper Williams of Bridgeport, Conn. to a letter of intent to play for the Minutemen next season. Williams was expected to make the official announcement at a high school banquet last night.

Calipari said he believes Williams will be an impact player for the Minutemen right away.

"He's a good player. He's a better player than an athlete in that he knows what to do on the floor," Calipari said. "He's more like an Anton Brown than a Jimmy McCoy in that respect."

Assistant coach John Robic said he thinks Williams is the best of this year's UMass recruiting class.

Williams was named Co-Mr. Basketball for the state of Connecticut this past season along with teammate Jerome Johnson. He played for coach Harrison Taylor at Bassick High School, which he led to a 26-0 season, the State Class L Championship and a national ranking of eighth by USA Today.

This past season at Bassick, Williams averaged 25.0 points and 14.0 rebounds a game, and he scored 1,207 points for his career. He was named first team All-State and was an honorable mention All-American by Street and Smith magazine.

> Robic: Williams is the best of this year's recruiting class.

He was also named the MVP of the Connecticut Jewish Community Center All-Star game and played in the New Haven Shootout.

Williams was also recruited by Seton Hall University, the University of Connecticut, the University of Hartford, the University of Rhode Island, Boston University and Central Connecticut State University.

But Calipari credits the work of assistant coach Bill Bayno for Williams' decision to come to UMass.

"Rhode Island really wanted him. Billy Bayno did a nice job. He really got in good with the people there [at Bassick]," Calipari said. "[Williams] also had a good visit here."

UMass also had another small factor on its side. Williams is the cousin of Charlie Smith, a forward for the NBA Los Angeles Clippers. Smith played at the University of Pittsburgh when Calipari was an assistant coach there.

Williams will join previous signees Tony Barbee, a 6-6 forward from Indianapolis, 6-6 Tom Pace of Denver, 6-9 Kennard Robinson of the Bronx, and 6-10 Gary Hughes of Naugatuck, Conn. as incoming freshmen for next year's team. Barbee and Pace were signed during the November signing period while Robinson and Hughes signed last month.

"This gives us a real solid class for next year," Calipari said.

Women's tennis team looks ahead

By BRAD HALFOND
Collegian Correspondent

With last Wednesday's loss at Dartmouth, the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team closed the book on a subpar 4-6 season.

There are several indications though that this spring's record will be the last of its kind for the Minutewomen. Next fall, several changes are going to take place that should lead UMass to more greener pastures.

Former head coach Ed Gentzler will return to his old job, replacing interim head coach Mike Husted. Gentzler is credited by most team members of bringing the tennis problem to a new level when he arrived in Amherst two years ago.

When he does return, Gentzler should be bringing along with him at least one prize recruit. The first, Elysa Rosenberg, who hails from Brooklyn, N.Y., is expected to immediately fill the No. 1 singles position for UMass. Previously, the tennis team had never recruited and this should be a major step toward bringing the program the recognition and respect it has been longing for.

This fact, along with the abundance of youth on the squad should ensure future success for the Minutewomen. Husted said, "We gained some experience this year and next year looks extremely strong."

The rising stars for UMass include sophomores-to-be Gail Girasella, whom Husted praised as a new leader, and the up-and- coming Vanessa Kircher. The rest of the youth comes from Allison Agnew, Shizuko Yamaski and Kere Edde.

Next season's veterans will be junior Maura Foley, who will become the new captain, replacing the graduating Karen McShane.

McShane, a three-year player, had a frustrating senior year, but says her tennis has improved overall. "I peaked during the spring of my junior year and one of my and the teams' best moments was defeating West Virginia in the A-10s that spring." McShane is also confident that next fall's squad will improve. "It's just going to get better and better," she said. Husted called McShane "a mature captain and a good leader."

Overall, Husted was satisfied with the team's performance. "We would have liked a winning season, but considering we used to never win, it's a good feeling. The program has built up and we're getting there."

Husted's future plans are uncertain at this time, but for the women's tennis team, the future is now.

Police end occupation; 40 arrested

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

After a 30-hour occupation, 35 protesters were arrested in Memorial Hall for trespassing early yesterday morning.

They were removed from the building at approximately 5:30 a.m. and led to a Pioneer Valley Transit Authority bus waiting in the pouring rain. Five people were arrested for disorderly conduct outside the building when they obstructed police walking in front of the bus.

As the bus pulled out, dozens of Massachusetts State Police, UMass Police and Amherst Police, clad in riot gear and raincoats, formed a wall in front of the bus and slowly walked ahead as the bus followed. About a dozen protesters stood arm and arm, forming a human chain, in an attempt to stop the bus. [See related photo, page 3.]

The bus, police and protesters moved slowly ahead until a scuffle between about six protesters and state police ensued. Several protesters were pushed out of the way. The five who were arrested were picked up and carried into a van.

"Don't get in the way. If you do, you will pay the price," Arthur Hilson, UMass director of public safety, warned the protesters as the bus moved past the Fine Arts Center.

Protester jailed after not identifying self

Collegian Staff Report

Of the 40 students sent to Leeds Armory yesterday to be booked and arraigned, 39 took one route, and the 40th took another.

"John Doe" was one of 40 protesters arrested at Memorial Hall yesterday morning, but after refusing to identify himself at the Hampshire District Court yesterday afternoon, he was sent to the Hampshire County jail.

Several protesters identified themselves as Abbie Hoffman during a related occupation two weeks ago, but Doe was not available to comment on why he refused to identify himself.

"As I understand it," said University of Massachusetts spokeswoman Stacy Chase, "you cannot be released on your own recognizance if you refuse to identify yourself."

Bush sends US troops to Panama

From the Associated Press

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said today that he is sending combat troops to Panama and evacuating dependents to protect Americans in the turmoil arising from a presidential election in the White House condemned as "electoral theft" by Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega.

Bush, facing the first foreign policy crisis of his presidency, said about 2,000 troops would be sent "to protect the lives of American citizens." About 21,300 American civilians, many of them retired, live in Panama.

"We will not be intimidated by the bullying tactics of the dictator, Noriega, brutal though they may be," Bush declared. Bush acted after consulting with congressional leaders, who gave him their backing, and with leaders of other Latin American countries.

"The Noriega regime first tried to steal this election through massive fraud and intimidation and now has nullified this election and resorted to violence and bloodshed," Bush said.

Bush also recalled US Ambassador Arthur Davis, and said companies doing business in Panama will be asked to bring home dependents.

He said Americans in Panama will be asked to leave the country or move within US compounds there. The United States maintains 10 military facilities there.

Administration sources said the Pentagon was preparing to send the troops from Fort Ord, Calif., and Fort Polk, La. The sources said one group of about 10,000 would be dispatched immediately from the 7th Light Infantry Division at Fort Ord. The other, a mechanized infantry division from Fort Polk, will be transported by ship and will not arrive in Panama for several days, the sources said.

The actions would beef up the 10,000-strong US troop strength in Panama with additional forces as one of a series of actions in response to the nullification of the Panamanian election results by Noriega and the post-election violent attacks against opposition politicians.

Bush was continuing talks with leaders of Latin countries to support various initiatives they were undertaking in the aftermath of what many condemned as an election blatantly rigged by Noriega, officials said.

For example, the president backed the call by Venezuela for an urgent meeting of the Organization of American States, sources said.

"The president is going to take a whole series of actions," said one administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity. The official characterized the moves as "prudent measures to assure the safety of Americans and assure the United States can fulfill its commitment to the Panama Canal treaties."

Earlier today, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said Bush has ordered US military forces to prepare for possible deployment, as he weighed a series of options against Panama, where rioters attacked opposition leaders.

Hillel to move into old BKO house

By SCOTT ROE
Collegian Staff

The house that Beta Kappa Phi once called home but has lain dormant since April, 1988, will be getting new residents next fall.

The University of Massachusetts Hillel Foundation is scheduled to move its offices from their present Student Union location to the vacant house on North Pleasant St., according to Hillel director Rabbi Saul Perlmutter.

Perlmutter said he hopes the former fraternity house -- closed after police found an illegal bar operation and an ounce and a half of cocaine -- will become the "Jewish cultural center for the campus." He said he

The other 39 protesters were arraigned at the Armory in Northampton and then released on their own recognizance.

At 12:20 p.m., the protestor was arraigned on charges of trespassing at the court under the name John Doe. Judge Alvertus Morse presided over the arraignment.

Morse asked Doe for his name and told him that unless he identified himself he would be sent to prison until he did so.

Doe, shaking his head no, said, "I'm sorry."

"All he has to do is do what everyone else has done in this proceeding," Morse said. Out of the more than 150 arrests that have taken place relating to the protests against military-funded research at UMass, this was the first instance of a protester refusing to identify himself in court.

"You think it's funny," said Morse, addressing Doe and several other protesters sitting in the gallery. "But we don't think it's funny. This kind of thing might be O.K. for a circus across the road, but not here."

Doe, who according to other protesters has been engaging in passive resistance since his arrest, was carried out of the courtroom face down by police officers. Twenty minutes later they carried him out of the courthouse and into a waiting police car.

While waiting for the car door to be opened Doe was left lying face down on the sidewalk.

Doe has been on a hunger strike since his arrest, protesters said.

Both the UMass police and the Hampshire County jail refused to comment on the incident.

Hillel to move

would like the house to become a "sort of Jewish Newman Center," open to all students.

Perlmutter said that he forsees no difficulties in being located in a fraternity environment.

"I hope we could even be a part of that in some way; this isn't a fraternity but it would be nice to be connected with what goes on there," he said.

Perlmutter said that he was uncertain when the offices for Hillel would be ready but that they are now taking applications for a "Jewish living community" with room for 26 students, which is scheduled to open next fall.

The idea of a living community came about because Perlmutter said that over the years Jewish students have spoken to him about establishing a place with a community feeling to it. The living area would be open to all students, Perlmutter said.

"This is not limited to Jewish students only, but to all people who want to live in a Jewish atmosphere," he said.

There are also plans to develop a center for Jewish studies in the building, which would include meeting rooms for both students and faculty and a library. According to Perlmutter, the library may be established in conjunction with the Judaic and near eastern studies department, but currently is in the planning stage.

Faculty: money from outside for research OK

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

In an emergency meeting yesterday, the Faculty Senate voted overwhelmingly to uphold its policy on the acceptance of outside funding for faculty research on campus.

The meeting, prompted by last week's occupation of the Graduate Research Center by more than 70 students protesting military-funded research on campus, was designed to encourage more dialogue between the two groups, said Dr. Harlan Sturm, chairman of the rules committee.

Student and community demonstrators have engaged in numerous rallies and four building takeovers in the past three weeks in opposition to Department of Defense funded research on campus.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey addressed the senate and proposed the creation of a student/faculty commission to review DOD funding and ways to build a stronger United States economy.

"Department of Defense funding has been and will continue to be actively discussed on this campus," Duffey said, reading a statement he gave to students Wednesday night during the second occupation of Memorial Hall.

The senate voted 55 to 4 to reaffirm the current policy, which was incorporated 17 years ago. The policy allows faculty members to seek grant support for research projects from government agencies, foundations and industries. Administrators assert that no classified research is allowed on campus.

The majority vote overrode a small outcry to postpone the motion until a commission can be formed to review the policy and offer any suggestions for revision to the senate at a later date.

"Simply reaffirming the existing policy without acknowledging there was a problem was a bad mistake," said Sen. Howard Ziff, who opposed the motion. "There are questions, let people bring them forward. Let's educate people about research."

Ziff, a professor in the journalism department, said at next week's meeting he will introduce a motion to appoint a committee to educate itself on both the senate's policy and research conducted on campus. The committee will be charged to report to the senate by spring, 1990 to reveal its findings, he said.

Peter Rossi, chairman of the Research Council, voted in favor of the motion and said: "We found that no changes are needed or warranted in current University policy. The University does not and should not impose any restrictions on legal sources of funding of research."

Town board nixes UM anthrax ban

By NANCY KLINGENER
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Board of Health yesterday rejected a proposal to ban anthrax research at the University of Massachusetts, ruling the defense-funded study poses "no immediate public health danger to the community."

The research, conducted by Professor Curtis Thorne in the microbiology department, is one of several under fire from student and community activists, some of whom have conducted building occupations to protest military-funded research at the University.

"The research conducted in Dr. Thorne's laboratory presents such a minute risk that we, the board of health, should take no action to prevent such research," said board member Diana Stein.

The three-member board voted unanimously to advise the select board that no action against the research should be taken.

The American Friends Service Committee had proposed a specific regulation banning all research funded by the US Army Biological Defense Research Program, which has provided $1 million over the past decade for the anthrax research. That proposal was defeated by two votes, with one abstention.

Representatives from the AFSC and from Physicians for Social Responsibility said they had anticipated the board's decision — and already prepared an appeal to the Department of Environmental Quality Engineering.

Dr. Ira Helfand, a member of Physicians for Social Responsibility, said the petitioners disagree with some of the board's scientific and procedural decisions.

"Our primary concern has been and remains the global threat this research poses," Helfand said. "That threat to the globe is a threat to the people of Amherst."

The University administration was "relieved and encouraged by the very thorough treatment of this subject by the board of health and particularly reassurred by their assurance t.. the community that there is no immediate health threat," said James Langley, associate vice chancellor for University relations and development.

Amherst Town Meeting, which is now about half-way through its 67-item warrant, is scheduled to consider declaring Amherst a "biological warfare research free zone" later this month.

After speaking at LBG rally student victim of homophobia

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

Adam Stein said the irony of the latest homophobic incident at the University of Massachusetts was that after he spoke about anonymous homophobic hate at a rally Tuesday, he said he was a victim of that same hate.

Stein, co-external coordinator for the Third World Caucus, said he spoke at the rally supporting lesbian, bisexual and gay UMass students because "the Third World caucus is an ally of the [Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance], not just me."

But when Stein, a sophomore, returned to his Gorman Residence Hall home, there was a message on his answering machine. He said the message was a slur against him and against the gay community.

He said that he is not gay, but because he spoke at the rally, the person who left the message assumed he was.

"It's funny that anyone who speaks out for gay rights is assumed to be gay," he said. "But people that are against oppression are against homophobia and will support gay rights."

Stein said he feels he was singled out because he appeared in a Collegian photo that appeared with an article on the rally.

Max Mitchell, co-president of the LBGA, said homophobic incidents are expected at UMass. He said a slight increase in the number of incidents occurs after gay community rallies and other public forums.

"It's a risk being an ally, too, because you're going to have to put up with the same terrorism gays, lesbians, and bisexuals put up with," he said.

"If it happens once at all, that's too much," Mitchell said.

Stein said though he is a long-time ally of the gay community, Tuesday was the first time he received "anonymous homophobic hate."

"It just shows that it's not just the gay community that are victims," Stein said. "Anyone can be a victim for speaking out for what you believe."

Students irate with tuition hike

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

Tuesday's 7.7 percent tuition increase by the Board of Regents has many students and faculty angry over how University of Massachusetts' administrators are handling the budget crisis.

"It [was] extremely expected so I'm not surprised at all. It seems to me that there was no serious thought given to it. [UMass] is becoming more and more like the University of Vermont and that's nothing to brag about," said Bruce Laurie, vice president of the UMass-Amherst chapter of the Massachusetts Society of Professors.

Laurie said he is concerned about access to state's higher education system and seriously questions where additional

As UM prepares for arena, call for more student input

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Student input is crucial to the planning of a $33 million multi-purpose arena at the University of Massachusetts, according to a member of the William D. Mullins Memorial Center Task Force.

Ari Weinstein, one of two students on the committee, said the state legislature allocated $25 million to the University specifically for the 10,000-seat facility.

"That's not money that the University could legally use for anything else," he said, "so students should have a hell of a lot of input." Weinstein, who is also talent coordinator for the Union Program Council, said such input would include the formation of a body, similar to the Board of Governors, which would oversee the operation of the facility.

The arena, scheduled to be completed in 1993, would be located on the west side of Commonwealth Avenue. It would house the University hockey and basketball teams and serve as a facility for exhibitions, convocations, Fine Arts Center productions and commencement exercises, according to the Memorial Center Feasibility Study.

Steve Shepard, the other student on the committee and production manager for UPC, said if the University did not accept the funding for the facility, it would be used to construct an arena at another Massachusetts university.

■ protesters arrested

A state police officer instructed the battalion of police to take half steps as the bus inched forward.

"My observations were that the actions taken were appropriate," Billy Weitzer, associate vice chancellor for student affairs said. "Getting the buses out of the area is the most dangerous part of demonstration for police, protesters and onlookers, I wish there was something to do to de-escalate the situation" he said.

The bus transported the demonstrators to the Leeds Armory in Northampton where all but one of the protesters were arraigned, according to Jeanne Hopkins, University spokeswoman. One of the protesters refused to identify himself and was subsequently taken to Hampshire County House of Correction, Hopkins said. It is reported that he is still in jail and has started a hunger strike. [See related story, page 1.]

The occupation, the fifth in four weeks, has resulted in 151 arrests.

The protesters demanded that all military-funded research at UMass end, and the disciplinary action taken against students protesting against the research be lifted.

The 19 students arrested last week in the Graduate Research Center were immediately suspended from the University upon arrest. The administration used an interim sanction to suspend the students without a prior hearing. After a meeting with the Dean of Students, Jo-Anne Thomas Vanin, the suspension was lifted pending a hearing for the students who do not have a record of disciplinary problems at UMass. Repeat offenders remained on suspension.

All students suspended under the interim clause will have a hearing to deal with other violations of the picketing code in the Code of Student Conduct, according to Gladys Rodrigues, associate dean of students. The hearing will ultimately determine if students will be reinstated.

Five suspended UMass students and one Hampshire College student continue their hunger strike protesting the disciplinary action imposed against the protesters.

The Memorial Hall occupation continued through Wednesday and into Wednesday night. There were no police inside or outside the hall until about 11:30 p.m. Wednesday.

"The police were fatigued [UMass] and we needed time to deal with the fatigue question and to deal with the ways to respond to the situation," Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs said.

When UMass police arrived to Memorial Hall, they blockaded the entrances to the building with yellow sawhorses. Police stood in the cold rain in front of the barriers. They had to break a window to enter the building because the protesters blockaded the doors with chairs, tables and boxes of computer paper.

There were about 30 onlookers outside who stayed overnight to support the protesters inside the building. At least six members of the Republican Club also lasted the duration. The Republicans countered the supporters chant, "Hey hey, ho, ho, D.O.D. has got to go with, "Hey, hey, ho, ho, protesters have got to go."

It doesn't look as if the protesting will end. As the demonstrators were being removed from the building, supporters were singing, "See you next week."

"I fear it's not over yet," Madson said.

■ reactions to increase

money for a promised relaxation of financial aid eligibility guidelines will come. The guidelines allow 3,000 additional students to receive funds, he said.

"The question of access does not seem to trouble higher education leaders in this state. These measures are taken without much thought to their implications," he said.

Art major Eddie Ching, a senior, has one more semester until graduation but said he would attend a different university somewhere else if he needed more time to finish his education.

"I'd definitely go somewhere else to get away from the budget, [and] to distance myself from the atmosphere here," he said. "I'd like to see some focus of attention on to other areas to solve the [budget] problems instead of looking to the students to solve the situation."

Not everyone is upset with paying more for their education because they believe UMass is still a bargain.

"I expected it, but I think it's still a good deal for the money," said junior Laurie Sorel, a public health major.

Sorel likes UMass even if she does plan to work two jobs this summer to pay for next semester.

Her only cause of concern is with the state because she feels the legislature does not understand the value of a quality, affordable education, she said.

"I think the University has to push harder as far as the state government goes," she said. "I don't think the state government takes us seriously."

What is in store for the future of public higher education's funding is still anybody's guess, said State Representative Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst).

"Even if the Board of Regents did not vote an increase, the [Massachusetts] Senate may have come up with exactly the same budget for higher education," he said.

"How much of that [tuition increase] will come out of higher education I can't say. Given that it's about 12 percent of non-local aid it's hard to imagine higher education escaping any cuts," he said.

■ faculty continues policy

Student demonstrators attending the meeting said nothing was accomplished because the senate reaffirmed the policy.

"It was a nightmare," said sophomore Laura Morrissette who was arrested during the first takeover at Marcus Hall two weeks ago and also during last week's occupation at the Graduate Research Center.

"I think the faculty is rather uninformed," she said. "I don't think they really know what's going on." The senate also voted to endorse Provost Richard O'Brien's statement made at last week's meeting in response to student protests.

O'Brien said, "this administration does everything it can to avoid arresting students," adding that such action is a last resort but is an alternative to ensure that the University is able to function.

EWC continues growth in spite of budget cuts

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Staff

Even as statewide budget cuts have stunted program growth across the University of Massachusetts campus, the Everywoman's Center has two programs that face no danger, according to an EWC coordinator.

The Educator/Advocate and Counselor/Advocate programs have definite expansion potential, said Deb Levy, program coordinator of volunteers of the counselor/advocate program.

Though the two programs, centered in Nelson House, rely heavily on volunteers, EWC Director Carol Wallace said the programs are significantly funded by a Department of Public Health grant. This is the first year of a new grant cycle, which is scheduled to continue for four more years, she said.

"Last year we were ranked among the top three of 23 proposals submitted for rape crisis centers throughout Massachusetts -- we were one in three in the state that was awarded maximum funding," Wallace said.

In the struggle to diversify the primarily white staff of the Educator/Advocate and Counselor/Advocate programs, Levy said women from different ethnicities and communities are being encouraged to apply for training.

"Our overall goal is to help women," Levy said. "We want to become more multicultural in order to service women of all colors and to reach women who aren't usually reached."

By training more Black, Latino, Asian, disabled and non-traditional students and other women from the community at large, Levy said, a larger part of the community can be reached, and more women can be helped.

These programs are important because instances of violence are happening more frequently, she added.

The Counselor/Advocates work the 24 hour hotline, Levy said, as well as providing short term counseling, leading support groups for rape and incest survivors, and assisting women with legal and medical advocacy.

The Educator/Advocate program holds workshops and presentations throughout the UMass campus and the community covering issues such as rape, date rape, media violence, pornography, eating disorders, and sexual harassment, Levy said.

"This program makes people more aware of these issues, and how their lives are affected by them," she said.

There are currently 21 Educator/Advocates and 18 Counselor/Advocates involved in the program, she said.

The programs have combined training at the beginning of each semester where women learn the specific skills needed for their program, in addition to crisis intervention skills, Levy said.

All women at UMass and in the community are eligible for the 50-hour training program, following an interview.

"The women have to be concerned and committed to these issues and interested in helping," Levy said.

Ask Us

Question -1:
I've been using condoms, is that enough to protect me against AIDS?

Answer:
Although condoms are an excellent barrier preventing the transmission of the AIDS virus, nonoxynol-9 (the active ingredient in some spermicides) acts to actually kill any AIDS virus which is present. Some condoms contain nonoxynol-9 as a lubricant, you should check the package or ask the pharmacist to make sure that it is present. Nonoxynol-9 can also be found in various over-the-counter contraceptive foams, jellies, and film. The spermicide found on lubricated condoms is adequate to protect against AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases (STD's). However, statistics show that more people are using condoms. Yet the rate of unwanted pregnancies is on the increase due to people not using spermicides with the condoms, as well as improper use of condoms.

In addition:
So you think that you know everything about AIDS, but did you know that. . .?

- There are over 87,000 cases of full blown AIDS in the U.S. right now.
- It is estimated that there are now between 1-2 million people that would test HIV positive.
- Natural and animal skin condoms cannot protect against AIDS and other STD's because the microscopic pores will allow viruses to pass through, whereas sperm are too large (e.g. Natural Lambs).
- Nonoxynol-9 is currently the only available spermicide that will kill the AIDS virus.
- Condoms are an effective, but not foolproof, way to prevent the spread of the AIDS virus.
- Currently the fastest growing population getting AIDS is women of color in New York City between the ages of 21 to 25. It is the leading cause of death for this age group.
- It is a myth that lesbians cannot transmit the AIDS virus (like any other sexually active group they are susceptible to AIDS and other STD's).
- Unlike people, viruses do not discriminate -- anyone can get AIDS.

Attorneys discuss problems confronting gay community

By JENNIFER GARVIN
Collegian Correspondent

The AIDS epidemic has caused major shifts in gay family law, two Springfield attorneys told a Student Union Ballroom audience Tuesday night.

Attorneys Ron Deon and Barbara Macy, members of GLAD, a Boston-based advocacy group for homosexual legal concerns, discussed legal problems unique to the gay community at a forum sponsored by the program for gay, lesbian and bisexual concerns.

Ten years ago, Deon said, his practice dealt mainly with guardianship and adoption of children by homosexual couples. AIDS has forced gay couples to make decisions concerning how property will be divided and financial decisions will be made in the event that one partner becomes ill.

Deon said lesbians have also felt the impact of AIDS because it has forced them to face their own mortality, and they too are now seeking legal advice on such matters.

Because the law does not allow gay marriages, gays face special problems and should seek legal counsel, the attorneys said.

The cost of an attorney is worth it, Deon said, because "what you pay today you'll save tomorrow."

"When you plan around relationships and property issues, your goal is to stay out of court. You want a predictable way of working out problems," he said.

In Massachusetts, the closest thing to legal marriage is what is known as, "Durable Power of Attorney" contract.

An example of what could happen if such precautionary legal documents aren't secured is the much publicized Sharon Kowalsky case.

In November, 1983, Kowalsky received severe head injuries that left her physically and mentally incapacitated. When her parents found out about her lover, Karen Thompson, they went to court and obtained legal guardianship of their daughter, and subsequently barred Thompson from visiting her. Six years and several court battles later, Thompson still hasn't been granted the right to see her.

BOG to negotiate GSS' $29,000 withdrawal

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate and the Board of Governors recently reached an agreement to renegotiate the GSS proposal to withdraw $29,000 in funds from the board, BOG Treasurer Lisa Balentine announced at last night's board meeting.

Former Board treasurer Joe Casali said the proposal, which occurred after a March meeting of the Board finance committee and the GSS, came as a surprise.

"They gave no indication [at the meeting] of this proposal," said Casali. "We addressed all their issues. It seems they already had it decided that they didn't want to fund us."

"We're not sure [the Board] is worth $29,000," said Senate treasurer Kevin Dodson at the Senate meeting Tuesday.

One of the GSS' concerns is that the GSS provides 20 percent of the board's funding, but does not receive 20 percent of the space allocated to registered student organizations, Dodson said.

The GSS is also upset with the board's handling of the Republican Club's behavior, said Greta von Heerden, former GSS president.

"We feel that the board has given into intimidation," said von Heerden. "[The Republican Club] never received and punitive action."

Casali said the withdrawal of GSS funds would hurt several programs on campus, including the Student Union Art Gallery and the Craft Shop.

"I don't think there will be a complete shut-off of funds," Dodson said.

The board hopes to hold a meeting within the next two weeks to discuss lowering funding, Balentine said.

In other business:

- The Board voted on several summer projects, including making the first floor Campus Center bathrooms handicapped accessible, establishing an under 21 dance club in the Campus Center, installing a second Baybanks machine, opening up rooms in the Campus Center for studying, installing a big screen television in the Campus Center, bringing in more exhibits to the Student Union Gallery, and providing a directory of student organizations in the Student Union.

CAG election battle continues

The fate of the Commuter Area Government presidency remained uncertain last night as the Student Judiciary continued proceedings to determine whether a second election should be held.

Co-candidates Robb Smith and Ted Chambers, who lost to co-candidates Tim Reilly and Alex Zarganes by four votes more than a month ago, claim ballot box workers failed to check if students carried enough credits to qualify to vote.

Also, at least one student voted from the Greek area, which is not considered part of the Commuter area.

The pair was granted a new election after the Commuter Area Governing Board reviewed the errors, but the board's decision is currently under contention by Undergraduate Student Sen. Bob McDevitt.

The Student Judiciary formed a tribunal, headed by Justice John Sanchez, to hear McDevitt's complaint and determine whether a new trial is warranted.

Clarinda Rose-Turner, acting CAG president, said filling the position will facilitate government work and activities planned for the summer.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Some made their choice — respect it

Protests. They seem like a new fad; they're all over the place. People have been reacting differently towards the protesters. Some have been condemning them, some are supporting them, and others could care less.

Minu Sebastian

I think protests are great. They show character and strength. If you believe in something, you should fight for it. I began to start a protest against the D.C.; I think students should be allowed to have two selections from the meat group at the same time. I didn't get many followers.

A recent and more controversial protest is trying to end military research on campus. Although the issue is controversial and everyone feels differently, there is one issue which effects all of us, the freedom to choose.

Many people walk by a protest and make fun of it. Some people are thoroughly disgusted and call the protestors "psychos," "druggies," and "animals." Some also say that the police have no choice but to use force such as "pain compliance" or other forms of violence to arrest the protesters.

These people are unaware and fail to see some important issues which are raised in a protest. One of these issues is choice. Life is full of choices and different people are going to make different decisions. Every person does have a right to choose to protest an issue.

In addition, people should think about the police and their roles in protests. When and why should the police be called in to intervene in a protest? How much force should they be allowed to use against the protesters?

When I hear people say that the police had no choice but to use force such as "pain compliance" or beating someone with a billy-club to arrest protesters, I can't help but wonder, how did these people get so brainwashed? Of course the police have a choice. They have minds; some of them chose to use violence to arrest the protesters.

Have people been manipulated into believing that the police have the authority to use violence as they wish? There are much better ways to subdue someone than beating them. Protesters are human beings. They are not animals and do not deserve to be treated that way.

I understand that most people believe that the police are here for our benefit and one of their roles is to maintain order. I agree with this. But, I do believe that the police have limits to their authority and should be questioned whenever they resort to force and violence.

When people protest any issue, they are standing up for something they strongly believe in. Considering the fact that they have a lot at risk, like jobs, reputation and their personal safety,this is an act that takes guts and courage. Protesters deserve our respect regardless of whether or not we agree with the issue being protested.

So next time you walk by a protest, don't be so quick to criticize. You made your choice . . . and so did they.

Thursday night Seder still had seats left

As the Manager of Kosher dining Commons, I would like to correct several inaccuracies in the letter written by Brenda Daniels, ("Unable to observe holiday," April 29).

First, there are 202 students on the Kosher meal plan and not 191 as stated. Yes, we do have 204 seats available, however, through past history we know that there will be a certain amount of students who will go home, and I authorized the Meal Ticket Office, about two weeks prior to the Seders, to sell 45 tickets (22 percent) for each night's Seder. The Wednesday night Seder did sell out, but the each night's Seder never sold out. In fact, the number of seats available was increased to 60, or almost 30 percent of the available seats.

Secondly, yes we do indeed give first preference to those students who are on the Kosher meal plan because they have to pay those students who sign up who still do not show up for the Seders. When this happens, we allow any student who is willing to wait in line to see if s/he can participate in the Seder to some in through an agreement with Rabbi Perlmutter. We did let several in on both nights.

Third, to move the Seder to a large DC is just an impossible task. Yeshiva University does not feed the number of students that we do, and they close down for one week in order to prepare for Passover. Passover requires a complete set of cookware that is used for the eight days and then stored until next year. Also, the cost of Passover food is very high, and when you have less than five percent of the total population of Jewish students eating on the Kosher meal plan, it is obvious to se why a much smaller area.

Had Daniels opted to attend Thursday night's Seder, she could have purchased a ticket at Franklin Meal Ticket Office the day she was in line, or had she talked to Rabbi Perlmutter or myself we would have told her to come Wednesday night, wait until all who had signed up were in, and then she probably would have been able to get in, there were usually seats open

Editorial childish

I am writing in response to the Board of Editors editorial on May 5 ("Punishment will not pacify") and in response to the actions of the student Department of Defense protesters. I find both to be irresponsible and childish.

Whether you believe in their cause or not, the student protesters had no right to take over a building on campus, or any place else for that matter. Protesters, along with the rest of us, have the right to speak their minds, picket, write letters and take advantage of other legal avenues to have their concerns heard. If enough people hear and have the same concerns, those in positions of authority will be moved to action, or will be removed from their positions. This is our system for change and it works.

If not enough people see the concern as significant and are not moved to action by the information presented to them, a protest dies, and rightfully so. This is our system to improve our society; it is a good system, and it works. Not many other countries have such rights.

But it seems that certain students believe that they have rights above the rest of the people. They believe that their concerns outweigh those of others, and henceforth, others rights. The legal avenue in too slow for these students, so they won't bother to use it. They know that the University is soft and overly tolerant of such illegal activities. In other words, they can get away with it, so they will do it.

The best analogy I can think of, is of a little child demanding something from its mother. When the mother can't or doesn't give the child what it wants, the child throws himself to the floor, kicking and screaming in a temper tantrum. From this point on, no matter what the parent says, the child won't listen, and finally must be physically removed from the floor.

I sincerely hope that these illegal protesters are made to take responsibility for their actions, including making restitution for their occupation. This is the first step in becoming an adult, being responsible for all of your actions. The Board of Editors of the Collegian has shown its immaturity by backing up these childish and illegal actions. These actions take away the rights of other University people to freely use these buildings in the manner in which they were meant to be used.

Let's grow up people.

University's actions condemned

We, the undersigned faculty and staff members, support student opposition to military weapons research and death-related research on the University of Massachusetts campus. We support their demands for free access to documents on research and for a committee to develop a plan for an economic conversion towards civilian funding sources for campus research. We share the concern regarding university reliance Defense funding threatens University autonomy and academic freedom. With students, we instead demand adequate funding for public higher education in the Commonwealth, and commend students for bringing these moral issues to the attention of the campus, the Commonwealth, and the nation.

We protest the University administration's overly punitive response to the recent student demonstrations against military weapons research. We strongly urge the University to show more sensitivity to students' legitimate concerns and call upon them to immediately reinstate suspended students and refrain from using threats of suspension or expulsion to deter students from exercising their constitutional rights. Those faculty members who signed this statement refuse to cooperate with students' suspensions and will continue to teach these students enrolled in our courses. We also protest the University's decision to ban students from campus, to charge students for the expenses of their own arrests, to levy other fines against them, and to call in off-campus police to arrest them. We condemn all University actions that stifle dissent on campus and discourage students from expressing their moral concern about campus policies.

The dream and the DOD

People usually say I'm too optimistic, but lately I've taken a pessimistic attitude toward my future.

Specifically I fear my degree, still a year off, will be worth less now than it would have been five years ago.

I've been having nightmares.

David R. Mark

In my dream I'm at a job interview. I am asked about my University of Massachusetts days. I hand my future employer my degree, my resume, and my disclaimer.

My disclaimer reads: I, David R. Mark, during my four years at the University of Massachusetts, never occupied a building. Nor did I ever spray-paint a sidewalk, kick a police officer in the shins, date rape a woman, incite a riot or join in a racist, sexist, homophobic or anti-Semitic incident. Nor did I become a communist, go drunk driving, or illegally hold a keg party. I never sold or bought drugs, and I never swore at any member of the administration.

Sure it's a nightmare. But if you ever listen to anyone from the outside world — the media, students who go to other colleges, parents — you'd think the 19,000 of us at U of M were basket cases, radical leftists who are prepared to occupy the world, doing bong hits with cheap pot.

Perhaps all the world should listen to people like Charles Lenchner, a hunger striker during the anti-military research protests and a true beacon of hope for the education system. He said, and I quote:

"I've tried fasting on Yom Kippur many times, but I've never succeeded. This time I'll make it. This is stronger than religion, it's the fear of the military."

Good Chuck, blasphemize my religion even as you destroy the worth of my degree. It's people like you that make me cringe in my nightmare when my employer says, "Oh, you go to UMass."

With all those professors giving their support to the protesters, one has to wonder if any of the occupiers will flunk out this semester. Four weeks of occupying buildings tends to have an effect on one's grades, I assume.

But then, you know what they say happens when you assume.

I have to believe at least one protester has thought at one point that they may end up with five incompletes instead of a 0.4 GPA this semester.

With all the calls the Collegian has received since the first occupation, I've begun to take a survey about what the average person knows about UMass.

Nearly everyone outside of western Massachusetts has no clue as to what Cutback City is, which may be the best reason we should move it to Boston.

Two jokes have surfaced since the occupations began. Neither are particularly good, but students should know them nonetheless.

The first says the protesters should take over Cutback City, thus killing two birds with one stone. [No one would care about them, and someone would then have a good enough reason to torch the place.] The second is that once school ends, we'll never hear about D.O.D. research again.

Funny how the truth isn't funny.

ARTS & LIVING

Director Holland has savage approach to film

By JIM COLE
Collegian Staff

Probably the most unusual thing about director Savage Steve Holland is his name. Not only has it been a nickname since his high school days over a decade ago, it's actually used on the posters and credits of his movies. 'Directed (or Written and Directed) by Savage Steve Holland.' In a business already as crazy as filmmaking, this is even more out of the ordinary.

But no one has ever called Holland ordinary. Growing up in Greenwich, Ct., he had barely picked up a movie camera when his girlfriend dumped him for another guy. Steve did not take it lightly, going mildly bonkers and indulging in a pseudo 'Elton John' look while letting his imagination run wild with his artwork and comics (and this is based on memories -- as Steve was a close friend of my older brother's, and I, though barely ten, remember some of it). Eventually, he put the experience into his first Super-8 movie, "which was shown to my english class, well received. . .and got thrown away."

Undaunted, Savage Steve went to college at Cal Arts in Los Angeles, where he continued his newfound interest in film, mainly doing graphic work. By graduation time, he'd penned a script and made My 11-year-old Birthday Party, which got shown at a local festival and also got needed attention. "One thing led to another," Holland says, and his script, Better Off Dead, was finally optioned after execs like Michael Eisner (then with Paramount, now Disney's boss), Henry(The Fonz)Winkler, and A&M Films President Andrew Meyer (who gave the green light).

Better Off Dead, inspired by his high school traumas, debuted in 1985, but was not a critical favorite. Yet it had, and has, a cult following of sorts. Savage Steve wasn't dealing with reality, but rather the distorted life of a victim of heartbreak, Lane Myer (John Cusack, who has obtained mild success himself.) Many college friends still remember classic lines like "Gee, sorry your mom blew up," or the moment Cusack gets dumped: "I've been thinking about it a lot, Lane, and I've decided it would be better if I went out with someone more popular." As one who suffered the cliques at Greenwich High as well, Holland's dialogue is more on target than one might believe.

One Crazy Summer followed in 1986, but it did not have the box office draw a director hopes for, despite the presence of Cusack (again), and Demi Moore. No new film projects beckoned until his latest film, How I Got into College. It had already been in development at 20th Century Fox, and production was underway, when the original director was fired. Holland stepped in, "mainly because I can write on the spot. The script wasn't ready for shooting, it wasn't funny enough, but the director, a woman who had done t.v., took the fall for it anyway."

Filming went from February to April of 1988, with the film originally designed for a fall release, "but the writer's strike changed that. The film wasn't completely finished, and we still needed to do 'pickups' (usually a few close-up reaction or expression shots of actors that are needed for the final 'polish'). "We couldn't resume until December, when we finally finished." The film stars Anthony Edwards (best known from Revenge of the Nerds), Corey Parker, and Charles Rocket (best remembered from

All ages club needs bands not booze

By WILLIAM JAMES
Collegian Staff

Problems, problems, problems. They're all over, but especially around here. Here comes the big weekend problem. You're not yet 21 years old. You want to see live local bands but generally the doormen at most bars in the area are trained to zero in and destroy all pieces of identification that seem to have naughty origins. If you do get in and you're flailing wildly in a crowd glistening with sweat and musical appreciation then, if your conscience is not overly diluted, you might just be able to visualize the overweight, grubby little club owner lining his pocket with your money. The anarchy of rock and roll making the sleazily rich sleazily richer. Two questions. 1. Why does there have to be booze wherever a band is playing? 2. Don't you think the incentive of money might perhaps affect the judgement/taste (?) of club owners?

Music is not just for alcoholic old adolescents, or another avenue for facist scum to get fatter. It is to be enjoyed by everyone, regardless of their political inclinations or choice of liquid refreshment.

There's this club see- it's called Club Soda or Gothic Street depending on your age and attitude. It is located in the People's Institute at -38 Gothic Street in Northhampton, a P.V.T.A. ride from wherever you may be in the Valley. On Friday nights, the place is devoted to giving mostly junior high school students a place to dance. So on Fridays it's called Club Soda.

On Saturday nights it showcases good local talent and is called Gothic Street because people who would generally appreciate seeing live local bands at a fair price in a well equipped club with a great dance floor get turned off by the name 'Club Soda'. Drink Coca-Cola even though it contributes to racial viciousness in South Africa, but don't go to a club with a name like Club Soda. Well, the fact that the place sells Coke is the only thing wrong with it so you're all set.

The club boasts what is considered to be one of the best sound systems in the Valley, which, coupled with comparatively fantastic acoustics makes for extremely good sound quality as all of the bands I spoke to who performed there remarked. In addition, Club Soda/Gothic Street has pretty much the only decent light show around, and a big, solid, wonderful, wooden dance floor. This is a rare commodity, especially in Norhthampton. I mean it's a dancer's dance floor. And when your breath gets too heavy, or if you're too cool (i.e. too embarrassed) to sway your lovely young hips there is a lot of tables, chairs, nooks, crannies, video games, pinball machines and that funky basketball game to fall into. The walls are covered in wildly colorful murals, the staff are all pleasant, the prices are very fair and all ages are welcome to the, as of now, generally bi-weekly Saturday night Gothic Street shows. So why don't you know about this place?

Club Soda is non-profit. It relies on everything but cash to get it's shows organized, staged and publicized. That's why you should know about it. There's no greedy club owner lining his pockets with your cash here. Just an honest attempt to put shows together to give people a good time. The shame of it is, this venture has not become nearly as popular as it deserves. That is not to say that it has been a failure but rather that, by virtue of its non-profit status it has not met with the acclaim that such a venue ought to.

"Our goal is to meet the age group that seems to have been forgotten," said Michael Doherty, a UMass senior and the manager of Club Soda/Gothic Street. "There's a whole market that's been forgotten; I hate to use the word 'market' because it sounds as if we're making money on this, which we're not because this is an entirely non-profit venture; but there's a whole age group that is being ignored even though they're just as, if not more, musically educated than people over 21 years old."

Club Soda opened up in early August of last year, the result of what Doherty calls "a real community project." $180,000 was raised through donations, and organizations such as the Northampton Honor Court which donated time and manpower. Doherty came to manage the club in October of last year and since then has enjoyed something of a success with the Friday night D.J. and dancing that is Club Soda. Through word of mouth this weekly event has become a regular hang-out for about 200 junior high school students.

What Doherty is trying to do on Saturday nights, however, has not proven so successful. "I provide the same quality entertainment as other clubs, only I do it without making a lot of money and with the underage in mind, but not only them in mind," he said.

Bands that have performed Gothic Street include Beatrice U.T.B., Gidget Goes to Hell, The Reds, The Demilos, The Vestrymen, and the Malarians. Julie Simon and Tim Eagan of Gidget said "It was the best club we've played- the stage, the lights, the sound, everything. And the manager (Doherty) was actually nice. He wasn't another scumbag trying to make money. He's really doing something worthwhile." In the music scene, locally, especially in the business side, this is rare.

John Morris, a manager of some local talent and lighting technician for a number of national acts, including the past Aerosmith/Guns n' Roses tour, said he was "impressed with the club, but it should really have more regular gigs lined up." This is the problem with Gothic Street. It's all dressed up with no money in its pocket.

"Being non-profit hurts us," said Doherty, "because there's not enough money to buy exposure, but at the same time we're lucky to be non-profit because we can help local artists, and they at the same time help us."

Check this place out. The next definite gig will be May 27 with The Reds opening for a reggae show. There's talk of Dinosaur Jr. possibly doing a benefit. If you're a local band in need of a gig call Michael Doherty at The People's Institute at 584-8313. They're always looking for talent. The space can also be rented at ridiculously reasonable rates for a number of activities; graduation parties and the like. This is a good nightclub. It is a worthy cause, and it needs your support.

Saturday Night Live, in the dog-days after Belushi but before Murphy, who used the 'f-word' on the show and got fired. Holland sees him as "one of the nicest guys you could work with. He unfairly took the brunt for the fall of that show.") How I Got Into College follows a guy, who as Savage Steve puts it, "is a real loser. He has no chance to get into any college, when in fact, he wants to go to an Ivy League school to be with the girl of his dreams. So the film's basically about how he 'makes it'." It's a subject Holland is not unfamiliar with, as breaking into the film world, let alone college, can be tough. While at Cal Arts, he also worked part time at the switchboard, where he would recommend himself for animating jobs. His directness and 'no holds barred' attitude impressed execs. Selling oneself, and taking risks, would seem to be vital in this particular business.

Now Savage Steve is taking his biggest risk of all. By now, he's up in Canada doing his first independent feature. "It's a nice change, not doing it for a studio. It's about how one's past can haunt you. A guy wants to marry this girl of his dreams, but remembers the blood pact he made with friends years before, vowing to kill themselves before age thirty, to avoid marriage and a parenthood at all costs." Holland writes and directs himself this time. As filmmaking goes (from one who has dabbled in it himself), directing yourself is probably the ultimate in masochism. But then again, Savage Steve Holland has braved rough seas before. He's probably loving every minute of it.

David C. Bischoff, dean of the School of Physical Education, chairs the committee, which includes representatives of Conference Services, the Fine Arts Center, Physical Plant and the College of Arts and Sciences.

Shepard said according to the present plans, the arena would not be properly equipped for large-scale concerts. WMUA has also requested a press box for sporting events, he said.

"We'd have to work around the basketball team's schedule [for concerts], but we need to make sure it's not solely controlled by athletics," said Shepard.

Bischoff, however, said he hopes the facility will accommodate as many different kinds of events as possible. Plans for the center are very flexible right now, he said.

"It can't be all things to all people," he said. "I think it's highly improbable that we'll have a tractor pull in there."

Shepard estimated that the arena probably would not be completed before 1994. He said the University-run center would be unique from other college arenas which are run by corporations, like the University of Nevada at Las Vegas.

The arena would seat 10,000 people for basketball games, 8,000 for hockey, which requires a larger playing area, and 5,400 for Fine Arts Center productions, Shepard said. Seating for FAC shows would be limited to one side of the oval arena, while large-scale concerts would have a larger seating capacity, allowing UPC to book larger acts than those that perform now, he said.

Shepard said the arena will also liberate the 4,200-seat Curry Hicks Cage for concerts as well. He estimated that UPC would book no more than one or two shows in the arena each year.

Saturday Night Live, in the dog-days after Belushi but before Murphy, who used the 'f-word' on the show and got fired. Holland sees him as "one of the nicest guys you could work with. He unfairly took the brunt for the fall of that show.") How I Got Into College follows a guy, who as Savage Steve puts it, "is a real loser. He has no chance to get into any college, when in fact, he wants to go to an Ivy League school to be with the girl of his dreams. So the film's basically about how he 'makes it'." It's a subject Holland is not unfamiliar with, as breaking into the film world, let alone college, can be tough. While at Cal Arts, he also worked part time at the switchboard, where he would recommend himself for animating jobs. His directness and 'no holds barred' attitude impressed execs. Selling oneself, and taking risks, would seem to be vital in this particular business.

Now Savage Steve is taking his biggest risk of all. By now, he's up in Canada doing his first independent feature. "It's a nice change, not doing it for a studio. It's about how one's past can haunt you. A guy wants to marry this girl of his dreams, but remembers the blood pact he made with friends years before, vowing to kill themselves before age thirty, to avoid marriage and a parenthood at all costs," Holland writes and directs himself this time. As filmmaking goes (from one who has dabbled in it himself), directing yourself is probably the ultimate in masochism. But then again, Savage Steve Holland has braved rough seas before. He's probably loving every minute of it.

THE COLLEGIAN NEWSROOM
The UMass tower library collapsed yesterday, killing hundreds of University students and employees.
Although no accurate count of the dead was possible before press time, the tragic losses almost ensure that Massachusetts schools will rank 51st in library acquisitions, behind all the states and the District of Columbia for the second year in a row.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Do not be misled by false promises. Only hard work will bring the results you desire. Assert your independence, but don't go overboard. Work on resolving any money problems. Investigate various savings programs.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Go after things that are really important to you. Aim high! Take advantage of a lull at work to catch up on paperwork. Handle an impasse in a relationship with aplomb.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Explore unknown territories, meeting with people from all levels of society. Your experiences could open new avenues for progress. Stick with basics in business and your finances will improve. Build savings.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Diplomacy and caution help you move forward in the workplace. An important relationship is loaded with challenges. Good judgement is linked to good health. Exercise self-discipline and avoid going to extremes.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) sound financial programs are in place. It is up to you to use them. Asking tactful questions will improve a relationship. Make your move at the right moment and romance will flower.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) The job outlook will be brighter next week. A difference of opinion over handling joint financial matters must be resolved promptly. Ignore past indiscretions and concentrate on the future. Act with confidence.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Handle financial matters early in the day. Also your weekend plans will not be delayed. You are overly eager to please others now. Do not rush into an impulsive romance.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Pay attention to financial trends and you can make a business move from a position of strength. Appearances count big now. Your magnetic personality gives you a tremendous advantage both socially and professionally.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Focus on real estate and finances and you will come out ahead of the game. Teamwork will eliminate any dangers that might exist in relationship-building. Go through regular channels when asking favors.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Good health depends on your willingness to assign more responsibility to others. A candid conversation with a business partner clears the road to success. You know where you both stand. Forge ahead.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Go ahead and test your ideas. Luck is on your side. Give a romantic situation a chance to gel. Taking a logical approach will show others they cannot control you. Share a secret.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) A romantic vacation will be good for what ails you. Be original and innovative at work and money pressures will ease. A social encounter proves surprisingly exciting. Wear something elegant this evening.

■ softball in A-10 Tournament

Keeping all this in the backs of their minds, the Minutewomen will send out the highly touted Aprile and her 1.22 ERA. Aprile may be as good as any pitcher in the tourney and it is a given that if she is pitching well, UMass will be tough to beat. However, Aprile cannot win it on her own, "the top six [players] have to produce," said Sortino.

Caminski is a fast pitcher and in the last outing between the two teams, UMass failed to execute. "We had trouble getting around on her and getting bunts down," Sortino said, adding that "execution is very important against Penn St."

One of the on-the-field leaders for UMass will have to Barbara Meehan. She leads the team in: average (.324), RBIs (21), and hits (47). It could well be UMass' balanced attack that will be the deciding factor.

One other possible factor could be heart. Sortino said, "I don't think I've ever seen a team come together like this." Smiling, she continued, "this is a special team for me." . . . And, with some braeks it could well be a special year.

■ men's track

Steve Brown and Garfield Vaughn will be running for UMass. Brown and Vaughn took 3rd and 6th, respectively, at Easterns. The two will join with Minutemen Steve Doran and Evon Walters to form the mile relay team, which placed 2nd at Easterns.

O'Brien will enter Herb Heffner, Fitz Hagan, and Jim McDonald in the steeplechase, and Chris Axford, Reinardo Flores, and Jerry Squires will be in the 5,000m. "They'll have to be on top of their game to crack the scoring column," said O'Brien.

The only two Minutemen competing in field events will be Jerome Bledsoe in the long jump and Joe Edgerton in the shot put. Edgerton, who will only be throwing in his 3rd meet of the season due to commitments to the football team, is looking to improve even more from his throw of 48' 4' at Easterns. Bledsoe is questionable to compete in the long jump because of a troubled quadracep muscle, and O'Brien says he's leaving the decision to compete up to Bledsoe.

■ women's track racing for ECACs

unbelievable," said LaFreniere. "But at least when Lee was running, it wasn't pouring."

LaFreniere has a lot of praise for Ambrose. "She's strong, confident, got her head together, and she is ready for some warm weather."

St. Pierre has been out of the spotlight for most of the season because she only had one chance to run in her best event — the 10,000. In her only chance to qualify for New Englands, she ran a blazing 37 minutes, 47 seconds at Fitchburg and came back the week after to run a 39 flat at Colby. LaFreniere said what St. Pierre has to do in the ECAC is, "Now she's got to run her third 10,000 in a row." As a result, LaFreniere has rested St. Pierre this week and is optimistic about her chances because St. Pierre's 37:47 would have placed her third in last year's ECACs.

As for the Balaouras and White, their chances are limited, as the best UMass throw (by Balaouras) is short of last year's sixth place throw of 144-3.

Last year, UMass scored eight points, six from DeSantis' third place throw, and tied for 21st place out of 45 schools. The competition will be the toughest the Minutewomen have faced all year. The very strong Ivy and Big East Conferences will be there, as well as schools from New England and the Middle Atlantic.

In light of the tough field, LaFreniere is not setting the highest expectations for her girls. "It would be nice to have everybody go down and set a PR," said LaFreniere. "Then I think we would be well-represented."

Rose given case report

NEW YORK (AP) — Pete Rose got his first look yesterday at baseball's case against him, a 225-page report with seven volumes of exhibits on his alleged gambling. He'll have a chance to defend himself on May 25 before Commissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti renders a decision.

Giamatti said he would not make a decision in the case until after the hearing, which is required by baseball's administrative rules.

"Pete Rose . . . is owed, in my opinion, an opportunity to review the report and its accompanying materials, and thereafter to respond to me, if he wishes to do so," Giamatti said.

The commissioner, who received the report Tuesday, said he sent it to the Cincinnati manager along with accompanying exhibits and materials.

Reuven J. Katz, one of Rose's lawyers, confirmed yesterday that he had received the documents. Giamatti, in a cover letter, wrote that Rose should not copy or disclose any of the materials.

Rugby and crew teams hit the road

Home Sweet Home; too bad for two UMass teams that home is in the past. Both teams will be on the road this weekend in their season finales.

The University of Massachusetts rugby team will be in action tomorrow. The Minutemen will be travelling to Worcester for their last match of the season against the Worcester Club.

The crew teams will also sea [sic] action on both Saturday and Sunday. Also in its last meet of the season, UMass crew will be in the City of Brotherly Love. The boats will be racing in a national championship (not THE national tournament) in Philadelphia.

Both game stories will be in the Collegian next week.

Women's track finale at ECACs

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will bring five athletes down to its final meet of the year — the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Championships, in Fairfax, VA this weekend.

As far as scoring team points, UMass coach Julie LaFreniere sees a hard road ahead for the Minutewomen. "The ECAC qualifying standards are such that even if you bring a team," LaFreniere said. "You're not necessarily in the ballgame."

She expects that javelin thrower Carla DeSantis and 400-meter runner Lee Ann Ambrose possess the best chances to score the points for UMass, while Amy St. Pierre has an outside possibility in the 10,000. Hammer throwers Helen Balaouras and Tina White are longshots as far as placing.

DeSantis holds the best chance of scoring because unlike Ambrose, who has been working at her best all season, she has been placing high even though she has been stuck in a season-long rut. So, if DeSantis breaks out and unleashes a good series, she is capable of placing very high. "Physically, she is capable of placing 1-2-3," said LaFreniere. Mentally, she could be ready to cut loose as this will be her final meet of her four-year athletic career.

Last weekend, DeSantis was a victim of bad weather conditions, like many, and it altered her form, which is absolutely essential to any of the throwers. "She tried to throw off of her eighth step, but she couldn't plant," said LaFreniere. "She had to move to a five-step, and she also was not aggressive not enough." DeSantis' throw of 133 feet, 10 inches was good for third place, but it was nearly 10 feet below her season-best and 25 ft. under her personal best and school record.

Ambrose will concentrate in the 400, where she is coming off of the race of her life (55.9 seconds), which was run in that same bad weather. "The wind was

Minutemen send 17 to N. Englands

By ROB SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

After a successful day at the Eastern Championships last weekend, the University of Massachusetts men's track team will head to Dartmouth to compete today and tomorrow in the New England Championships.

Two weeks ago, the Minutemen competed in the Penn Relays, the largest invitational track meet in the country. Then there was last weekend at Easterns, where the Minutemen rose to the occasion with a balanced team effort, placing third. It has all been building up to this one meet — the New England Championships.

It's been building up for senior Steve Tolly, who will defend his New England title in the 1,500 meters this weekend. Tolly competed at the Penn Relays, running the mile-anchor leg in the distance medley, and had some bad luck. Tolly received the baton 15 yards behind the pack of runners. He had little chance of catching up so he went for broke but came up short. Last weekend at Easterns, Tolly ran very well, placing second. "He looks the best he's looked in two years," said UMass head coach Ken O'Brien after the meet. Tolly had problems with his Achilles' heel last year, and was not in top form, although he won the title in the 1,500 at New Englands. This year's 1,500 might present more of a challenge. "That might be the toughest event of the meet," said O'Brien, who mentioned that many of the other runners in the 1,500 this year can run a sub-4:05 mile, about the same time as Tolly.

The 4x100 relay team of Mike Grey, Felix DeLarosa, Kevin Walters, and Evon Walters ran a season best 42.9, taking 5th at Easterns last weekend, and should do well, according to O'Brien.

In addition to running in the 4x100, Grey, DeLarosa, and Kevin Walters will also run in the 100 and 200.

Jeff White placed 6th in the 110 high hurdles at Easterns with his fastest time of the year, 15.51, and will run in the highs this weekend. In the 400, ironmen

It's 'tourney-time' for softball

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts softball team is in New Jersey today and will start the last leg of its journey to the NCAAs. But in order to go to the NCAAs it must win this weekend's tournament, and it will not be handed to them. This is the Atlantic 10 and as UMass coach Elaine Sortino points out, "We need some breaks, but whoever wins will need some breaks."

Atlantic 10 Tournament

The Atlantic 10 Tournament consists of four teams. The four best teams in the conference this year are, in order of seed, Temple, UMass, Penn State, and Rutgers. UMass' first game is this afternoon and will be with the number two-ranked Penn St. UMass swept the Lady Lions earlier this year when the two teams played here. The final scores were 4-0 and 1-0, with Holy Aprile and Chris Wanner getting the shutout wins.

One of the players to watch on Penn St. is Kathy Caminski. Caminski is her team's starting pitcher and although her record is 10-18 it is fair to say that she can hurt your team. "She's a great pitcher . . . probably one of the best," said Sortino. And her ERA of 1.79 backs that up.

Leading the Penn St. team both on and off the field is captain Donna Devanney. The catcher leads the team with a batting average of .296.

While the Penn St. is the defending champion it is obvious that it is not the team it was last year. "We lost all but four of our starters," said Bud Thalman, director of sports information for Penn State.

If UMass is able to beat PSU, it will go on to play the winner of the Temple vs. Rutgers game. That game will see an interesting battle between the top pitching of Temple against the impressive bats of Rutgers.

Temple's pitching consists of two top-notch right arms. Brianna Jazebak leads the team with a 16-7 record and a .92 ERA. She is closely followed by Kathy McCarthy, whose record is 13-9 and ERA is 1.13.

Temple is also a tough out. With the likes of Dionna Harris who is batting .324 and leads the conference in homeruns (6), triples (11), and RBIs (26). And with Denise Sarno who is batting .319, Temple poses a threat to any team.

Rutgers will go to the tourney without the services of its number one pitcher, Nikki Ambruaso, who broke her clavicle in a game against Rider College. Both her and her 1.16 ERA will be missed and it will be up to Lisa Dorward to fill the void. Doward's ERA is 1.6 and her record is 12-12.

NCAA pairings 'up in the air' for Lax

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Sunday at 6 p.m. the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will learn at least a little about what its fate will be for this season.

At that time, the NCAA tournament committee will announce its pairings for the postseason party which begins next Wednesday. It isn't a matter of whether UMass will be there or not — but where it will be seeded.

As of right now, the whole picture is pretty foggy. There are still games going on this weekend that could potentially throw everything out of whack.

Syracuse has locked up the number one spot. Johns Hopkins, which had been number one all year, lost in double overtime to Towson State but number two is still set for them.

After that, the possibilities are endless. Loyola is ranked third despite being the only unbeaten team in the country (9-0). The Greyhounds have to play Delaware tomorrow, and a loss there would make things very confusing. Fourth-ranked North Carolina (11-3) also has to play No. 13 Penn tomorrow.

Adelphi is fifth at 11-2, followed by UMass (12-2) and Maryland (9-3) in a tie for sixth. Navy (7-4), Cornell (9-3) and Virginia (7-5) round out the top 10.

These teams shouldn't have much to worry about, with the exception of Virginia, whose record puts them on the proverbial fence. The bottom five: Towson State (9-4), Yale (10-5), Penn (7-4), Duke (9-6) and Brown (9-6) will be a dogfight.

In makings its decision, the committee will take several things into consideration, including overall record, strength of schedule, closeness of games and common opponents.

Loyola, in its unblemished travels has knocked off Adelphi, Towson, Duke and Maryland. That probably would be enough to keep them third if they win. Carolina has lost to Maryland, Hopkins and Syracuse, but has enough strength to stay fourth.

Adelphi is a tough one to figure. Early-season losses to Loyola and Syracuse started the Panthers off rough, but they've come on strong. However it will be tough to overlook UMass, with two losses by a total of two goals. The Gorillas also handled Syracuse much better (10-9 compared to 18-11).

Maryland will be a committee favorite, because the Terps will host the Final Four. Navy, with four losses by a total of six goals will be tough and Cornell is a strong tourney team. Four of Virginia's losses were to teams in the top seven.

Towson has the big Hopkins win and three one-goal losses. Yale could be in trouble, and Penn can really make a case by beating North Carolina tomorrow, but the committee can't forget the 22-1 blasting administered by Syracuse two weeks ago.

One Western team will get an automatic bid. Michigan State, Notre Dame and Air Force all are in the running for that spot.

Assuming that Loyola and North Carolina prevail tomorrow, here is one person's prediction as to how the NCAA will rule:

1. Syracuse; 2. Johns Hopkins; 3. Loyola; 4. North Carolina; 5. UMass; 6. Adelphi; 7. Maryland; 8. Navy; 9. Cornell; 10. Towson State; 11. Virginia; 12. Michigan State.

Administrators offer to lift suspensions

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts administrators agreed Saturday to lift the suspensions of all undergraduate students arrested protesting military-funded research on campus, provided the students perform community and campus service and cease violations of the Picketing Code through graduation.

"We are not dropping anything, we're modifying the disciplinary procedure," Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs said. "The students are still being held accountable for their behavior."

The UMass students arrested in the five occupations, protesting the research or the disciplinary action taken by the administration, can schedule a pre-hearing with the Dean of Students staff to discuss the agreement, Madson said.

"If the students sign an administrative agreement at the pre-hearing, they can immediately salvage the semester's work," Madson said.

Suspensions and disciplinary action will be lifted only if the affected students sign the agreement, according to Madson.

"I think for the students to decide to get back into classes and take their exams is a positive step," Chancellor Joseph Duffey said.

Five hunger strikers and three students issued a statement accepting the conditions offered Friday by Duffey.

"We agree recent occupations have been disruptive to normal University life and operations. We would like to extend an apology to all students, faculty and staff who were inconvenienced by these actions. We understand that some people were frightened - they were innocent bystanders, and there was no intention to disrupt their work," the statement said.

The six hunger strikers and the fasters who supported them ended the hunger strike Saturday when the administration and protesters reached an agreement.

Identification for police argued

Visible numbering requested

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students and Amherst police differ over the need for officers to have clearly marked identification numbers on their uniforms.

About 25 Amherst police officers were called in two weeks ago to assist UMass police with the arrests of 35 people who occupied the Graduate Research Center. The Amherst officers were not wearing identification numbers.

UMass spokesperson Stacy Chase said, "[The Amherst police] were invited to back up our police in a situation that could become volatile."

Chief of Police Donald Maia said the police are not required to don ID numbers because the Town of Amherst has not accepted the provisions in the Massachusetts General Laws stating that any uniformed police officers are required to "wear a badge, tag or label which identifies him by number."

Maia said the officers ordinarily wear ID numbers, but removed their badges at the GRC because for security reasons. Their riot helmets were unmarked because they had never been used before, he said.

"People get scratched and cut and injured by [badges]," Maia said, adding that, "the helmets just came out of the boxes."

While the arrested protesters were being transported from the GRC to Warren McGuirk Stadium in a PVTA bus, police clashed with outside supporters who attempted to slow the bus's progress.

Three of the supporters were arrested and charged with disorderly conduct. No complaints have been reported concerning the conduct of the Amherst police officers during the arrests, Maia said.

UMass student Sam Kelley, one of the students who ran alongside the bus, claimed he was hit by several police officers officers while "escorting" the protesters.

Kelley said there should have been some formal way to identify all of the police officers.

"I turned around once to see who hit me and I got smashed in the chest so I didn't want to turn around again," he said.

Kelley said the Amherst police did wear ID numbers at the Memorial Hall arrests last week, but added that the numbers were on the back of their helmets.

"It would be better if they had [the numbers] on the sides of their helmets," he said. "What are we supposed to do? Ask them to please turn around so I can see your number?"

Maia said the numbers were added to aid police in directing officers and not for the benefit of the public.

"Identification numbers will be for our own purposes," he said.

"An identification number is just one phase in identifying an individual police officer," Maia said, adding that people who have a complaint against an officer must identify the officer "in the usual way, by identifying the person's face."

However, Tracy Davis, Student Government Association president, said the riot gear police wear makes it difficult to see their faces.

Counter demonstration overthrows pro-life rally

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

Friday's Rally for Life turned into a rally for choice as 200 people staged a counter-demonstration at noon on the steps of the Student Union Building.

Before the Rally for Life began, People for Choice, the University of Massachusetts chapter of NOW, and other pro-choice groups on campus held a pro-choice counter-rally inside the Student Union.

Twenty women and two men stood on the balcony and spoke to the 100 supporters below about a woman's right to choose and the importance of keeping abortion safe and legal.

Binky Feldman, a pro-choice demonstrator, said that the demonstration was organized a week ago, after pro-choice organizations heard that the Republican Club and Students for Life invited Robert Cooley, a representative from Operation Rescue, and Dr. Mildred Fay Jefferson, president of the Right to Life Crusade, to speak at the Rally for Life.

The counter-demonstrators joined the Rally for Life at noon, and outnumbered the pro-life supporters 10 to one.

As the pro-choice supporters chanted "Operation Rescue your name's a lie, you don't care if women die," Cooley, a member

Pro-choicers overwhelm rally

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

The Republican Club wasn't too happy with the way things went at the Rally for Life last Friday.

The rally was intended to support the right-to-life movement, but instead it became a shouting match between 200 pro-choice supporters and 20 pro-life activists and Republican Club members.

"We're in an atmosphere where you should open your eyes to the other side," said W. Greg Rothman, president of the UMass Conservative Alliance. "It hurts your capability of learning if you don't listen."

The Republican Club and Students for Life invited Robert Cooley, a representative of Operation Rescue, and Dr. Mildred Fay Jefferson, president of the Right to Life Crusade, to speak at the rally last Friday, hoping to generate a large pro-life crowd.

"Not much of what we said was heard," said Ted Maravelias, president of the Republican Club.

of Connecticut's Pro-Life Action Network and a representative from Operation Rescue, began the rally.

"It seems to me that in our country we don't have any morality anymore," Cooley shouted. "[But] until we get back to Judeo-Christian values, unborn babies will continue to die."

Cooley told the crowd that Operation Rescue was not going to go away and that the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court ruling legalizing abortion was "on its way out."

"It's obvious who's the majority here," said sophomore communications major Tania Ivany. "I haven't seen one pro-life supporter yet."

"We wanted more than just a protest," Feldman said. "It is a two-part demonstration — we want to empower ourselves first, then show the pro-lifers that we are the majority."

Supporters cheered the counter-rally for its organization and its emotional power.

"I hope it receives as much respect and attention as it deserves," said Beatrice Berley, a senior at UMass.

Lauren Desaulniers, a sophomore, agreed with the pro-choice demonstrators. "I think it's ironic that a man, who could never get pregnant, is telling me what to with my body."

Jefferson, a pro-life advocator from Boston was the only woman to speak at the pro-life rally, although her dialogue was not well received by the crowd.

"It was an honor to have Dr. Jefferson speak here," said W. Greg Rothman, chairman of the UMass Conservative Alliance. "But I'm not surprised they shouted down our speakers," he said.

The counter-demonstrators continued to dominate the Rally for Life throughout her speech.

"It's about individual freedom," said Martha Davis, a first year graduate student in Public Health. "Women will continue to seek abortions, and it's important to keep them safe and legal."

UMass prof receives national honor

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

Excellence at the University of Massachusetts is not dead, as the recent appointment of linguistics professor Barbara H. Partee to the National Academy of Sciences well shows.

The NAS is one of the most prestigious groups of scientists in the country, with candidates approved for membership through a secret ballot. If accepted, candidates are then notified of their membership never knowing they were even under consideration, a spokeswoman for the NAS said.

Partee's appointment is special for UMass because she is the first professor to be accepted while employed by the University, said Provost Richard O'Brien.

"Election to membership in the Academy is one of the highest honors that can be accorded a US scientist or engineer," he said.

But the individual most excited by the appointment might be Partee herself.

"It's a big honor. It's very exciting and it was a complete surprise," said Partee, 48. "[The honor] makes me feel gratified on a number of counts. There are few women [in the Academy.] I don't know the proportion . . . but it's tiny."

Membership to the NAS is not based on any one particular accomplishment but the all around calibre of the candidate, said the NAS spokeswoman.

Partee's main work concentrates on the relationships of syntax and semantics, logic and language, and mathematical methods in linguisitics, she said.

The idea of being a member of the Academy and what this means for her career is only now sinking in, she said.

"You can be the most famous person in your field and still get turned down. But for other sorts of honors it seems they almost propagate themselves" because of their membership, she said.

There are 1,500 Academy members across the country. California leads the nation with 400 members and Massachusetts is second with 200, most of whom are from the private college community, Partee said.

Only four other UMass professors have been members of the NAS, according to the Office of Public Information.

In an attempt to make the most of Partee's acceptance, State Representative Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) has asked her to go to the Statehouse in Boston and speak about the "quality" education available at places like UMass, she said.

Her participation in such an endeavor carries much weight, she said. A recent review of the UMass linguistics department cites it among the top five in the nation, she said.

Professor Partee holds a doctorate in linguistics from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and a bachelor's degree in mathematics from Swarthmore (Pa.) College.

Students sink or swim in lifeguard certification test

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

So you think being a lifeguard is simply wearing a Day-Glo bathing suit and sitting on a tall chair, getting a tan? Wrong. Before you hit the beach you have to hit the pool — Boyden Pool to be specific.

Last week, about 15 University of Massachusetts students did just that, swimming and testing for certification, and what they hoped would be a job as a lifeguard at one of the University's three pools, in Totman, Boyden and Curry Hicks Gyms.

But first, students had to have several prerequisites, including Red Cross Certification in First Aid, CPR and Advanced Life Saving, according to Kristen Peers, a lifeguard supervisor.

Jim Boudreau, another supervisor, said lifeguards also need to learn and be certified in First Responder, which deals with specific emergencies not covered in regular First Aid training, such as emergency childbirth.

The test, in several parts, deals with specific training required for the job, Peers said.

Students took a written exam covering aspects of First Aid and First Responder. Then they showed Peers how to save a person using CPR, mouth-to-mouth resuscitation and the Heimlich maneuver. Finally, after swimming 500 yards in under 10 minutes, they demonstrated to Boudreau how to rescue a conscious person, and then how to rescue an unconscious person a short distance from the pool's edge.

According to Russ Yarworth, the University's aquatics director, hiring is on a point system, and applicants who score the most points are hired.

He also said the test, which follows state requirements for lifeguarding, is necessary in light of recent incidents, such as last week when a UMass junior drowned at Puffer's Pond.

"We want to make sure the lifeguards we hire are qualified . . . to make sure these kids know [their CPR, First Aid and Advanced Life Saving]," Yarworth said, adding that students can easily get certified in these areas.

Yarworth said the biggest risk occurs during the open swim period, when it is difficult to catch people in danger of drowning, and when older swimmers could have a heart attack in the water. Prospective lifeguards are "encouraged to use their brains" and not dive in the water after them.

"Another body in the water would only make it worse," he said, adding other methods, such as reaching to them with pool equipment, would make more sense.

Many students tested last week were returning lifeguards. One of them, sophomore Alan Brust, 19, said that working at the pool is different from lifeguarding at Craigville Beach in Hyannis, his summer job, because there are no undertows or small children to worry about.

Brust, who has been lifeguarding since he was 16, said, "It's a lot of fun, especially at the beach where there's a lot of people."

Stephanie Bloom, a sophomore applying for the first time, said that she wants to become a lifeguard because the nature of the work was different from that of most part-time jobs.

"It's more responsibility than some behind-the-counter job," she said. "I can accomplish something even if I don't save somebody."

There is a fairly high demand for lifeguard jobs at the University, and a low turnover rate, Yarworth said. About 20 lifeguards are hired per semester, many of whom are freshmen and sophomores who remain lifeguards until they graduate, he said.

Suicide a very real part of college life, experts say

By DEBORAH RITTER
Collegian Staff

The college years.

Most University of Massachusetts students, when all is said and done, will look back and remember them as exciting and carefree. But a few won't live that long.

A few will commit suicide.

Last month's attempt by a UMass student to hang himself at the Newman Center underscores how vulnerable some students are during this time of the year.

"That young man clearly did not expect to be found," said Dr. David Kraft, executive director of University Health Services. "He may not live. Something like this sends ripples throughout the campus."

According to the Department of Public Safety, six students have attempted suicide on campus this year. Thus far, none of the attempts have been successful.

Statistics show the suicide rate at UMass is well below the national average for people of college age. In most years, there are zero to two suicides, about half what it would be among the general population of 18- to 24-year-olds. Nevertheless, suicide among college students is on the rise.

"The rates have doubled since the early 1960s," Kraft said. "It's one of the few things that kills young people."

Most experts agree those who attempt suicide while in college have problems that began before they entered school. Many were raised in dysfunctional families, suffered a loss of some kind, or have low self-esteem.

Depression is often a factor leading to suicide, says Carol Graffen, a doctoral student in clinical psychology at St. John's University.

"There is a spiralling quality to depression that can be dangerous," she said. "First you feel worthless, and that makes you sad. Next you feel guilty and ashamed of your bad feelings about yourself.

"At the point where you most need to reach out, you withdraw," she said.

Depression is extremely painful, Graffen said, and interferes with the ability to concentrate. Lethargy, another symptom, contributes to making the depressive just want to give up.

"The act of suicide is the ultimate way to punish yourself for being who you are," she said.

About one half of the students who committed suicide at UMass sought help beforehand, according to a study Kraft published in 1980. Also, statistics show that most suicides tell a close friend or relative of their intentions prior to the act. Graffen said often these warnings are not taken seriously.

"Suicide is a very scary thing," she said. "It makes people very nervous. Our culture is pulsed for rationality, technology, and quick answers. Human emotions are just the opposite. They take time, caring and sensitivity, all things we value less and less."

Father Joseph Quigley, administrator of the Newman Center agreed, saying, "People today are brought up with the idea that you should be able to handle everything yourself. That knocks the starch out of some people."

Kraft said he tries to make sure students are not left alone to cope before they get to the point of even considering suicide.

"I don't call what we do 'suicide prevention,'" he said. "If we wait for an attempt, we're already too late.

"A lot of our work is training others to recognize the signs of trouble," he said. "Residence Advisors and Directors have meetings with us regularly."

When someone is contemplating suicide, he or she may behave in ways that everyone should be alert to, Kraft said. A general withdrawal from the regular goings on of life, giving away belongings, and putting affairs in order are all possible signs.

"From my point of view even one suicide is one too many," he said. "There are many people determined to kill themselves, who, if given help, will change their minds. With the right help, they can get back to productive lives."

The hunger strikers said they had been drinking only water since last Saturday. Dr. Ira Helfand, who monitored the students' conditions said the health of all but one student appeared to be stable. Eyad Kishawi said he passed out three times and had a rapid heart rate.

The community service is part of the disciplinary process and will allow students to make restitution for the cost of mobilizing outside police forces, Madson said.

Overtime pay for UMass police alone averaged more than $20,000 for each occupation, Madson said.

JoAnne Thomas Vanin, dean of students, and the protesters will negotiate what constitutes community service, and the amount of service that is necessary.

The service can be performed on campus or in the students' home community, Madson said.

"My hope it will include some form of campus service," he said.

"It's up to interpretation [of what is considered community service]," Johnathon Leavitt, a student protester said.

Jessica Faller, a former hunger striker, said members of People for a Socially Responsible University have been performing a community service by protesting the Department of Defense research.

"We are definitely trying to unsully the filth that is piled on the University," Faller said.

Duffey said, "That's not the type of community service we have in mind."

The students who have been suspended can go to class and take their finals, but the reinstatements will not be processed in the registrar's office until the community work is complete, according to Madson.

The Northampton District Court will continue processing the charges of trespassing and disorderly conduct against the protesters, because the administration does not have authority to dismiss the charges.

Duffey said he would work with Arthur Hilson, director of public safety to lift the trespass notices served to Five College students so they may resume classes at UMass.

The protesters were not admitting guilt by accepting the administration's offer, according to Rahel Gottlieb, a demonstator.

"It was a mutual agreement," she said. "We met somewhere in the middle, hopefully the dialogue will continue."

"This opens up dialogue on the research also, but we will continue to fight against the DOD research next semester," Gottlieb said.

Madson said he hopes the dialogue between students and the administration will continue without disruptions.

■ Republicans react to rally

Cooley and Maravelias blamed the members of the crowd for the outcome of the rally. "There were a lot of very vocal radical feminists," said Cooley, "and our opinions were squelched by hecklers.

"Basically, it wasn't a productive dialogue," said Cooley. "But it was a hostile mob."

But the hostile mob also had trouble hearing what the speakers were saying, and Maravelias said the Student Activities Office was to blame.

"Our volume was regulated [by the SAO], they wouldn't let us turn up the volume of the amplifiers," he said.

"It was an attempt by the University to stifle the opposing opinion and suppress our freedom of speech," Maravelias said. "They were afraid for the truth to be heard, that's my opinion."

The Republican Club plans to take legal action against the SAO, Maravelias said.

The real problem at the rally wasn't the people or the microphone, but a lack of communication, Cooley said.

It did not have to do with "who shouted at who," he said, but that in this situation, there is no true communication.

"There has to be an underlying value of respect - both sides are guilty of the 'zoo-y' atmosphere," he said.

■ police identification

"With the helmets and visors, it makes it tough to identify them. I would prefer to see the numbers on the sides of their helmets," said Davis, who has been an official observer at the last three occupation arrests.

Ted Maravelias, president of the Republican Club, said he is worried that the officers did not wear ID numbers at the GRC arrests.

"Policemen must be accountable for what they do," Maravelias said. "They should not be ashamed of what they did [at the GRC]."

Eran Loebl, a senior communications major who watched the GRC arrests, agreed.

"The police should have enough confidence they are doing the right thing that they don't have to hide behind a generic uniform," he said.

Childish anticipation reborn

A girl of eight clutches a row of tickets, stamps her foot with impatience behind what seems to her thousands of people in line, stuffs her face into a pink puff of cotton candy and says, 'Look how high it goes, Daddy!'

In fifteen minutes they are incarcerated inside a cold metal cart of a ferris wheel, the girl's knuckles are white from grasping the metal protecting bar for dear life as she feels her stomach jump outside of her body and splatter on the concrete. Her father is suffering from acrophobia, looking down on his town from 100 feet in the air. Where's our house? The girls' eyes are clamped shut, she wants to yell what's going through her head: Get me out! Tell the man to stop! I wanna . . . AHHHH! take me home!

A lifetime later the father staggers away from the wheel of hell, dragged by his healthy-in-a-hurry daughter, and winds up hurling basketballs into 2 inch circumference hoops to win the girl a stuffed dog with spots. The daughter, losing interest after her father takes too long in his efforts (losing 3 consecutive shots), pulls on his sleeve — Let's go on the ferris wheel again!.

Isn't it funny how childish anticipation works? A youngster sees something fun and exciting like a ferris wheel, roller coaster or even a Jim Dandy, craves to overcome the object (as an adult would), gets the chance if he or she is "good," approaches it with utter fervor and good intention, then right smack in the midst of enjoyment, longs to vomit, then after a certain resolution period, is gung-ho to try the experience all over again? It happens every time.

Thirteen years later during the week before her final exams, the same girl (a woman now) chances upon the first carnival she's been to in years. It smells the same — mixed aromas of fried dough and jelly, caramel and candy apples with 3 nuts stuck on top, old hot dogs plopped inside soggy roles smothered with bright yellow mustard and stale ketchup, salted french fries, huge domes of pastel cotton candy. She takes a bite of each item that her friends buy.

In the midst of this sugary pig-out, one of them suggests going on the ferris wheel. The combined gook of lemon meringue from fried dough and hairs of fabric from cotton candy do not impede her sticky mouth from answering an inspired YES! Then another has the nerve to ask if she'll be scared. This ferris wheel in Amherst center goes awfully fast, around and around and around . . . For a moment she reminisces the wonderful times she had on rides with her dad. Bah! She was never the least bit afraid of anything! Besides, she's 21 now, and it looks so exciting! — the neon lights, the merry-go-round music accompaniment, the wide-mouth grins of those spinning above Amherst.

The man in charge yelled "Next!" and she and a bigger friend are snapped inside a cart. Before they complete the allotted 6 revolutions that complete a ferris wheel ride, their cart is halted at consecutive stops to let other riders on. They are stuck on the very top for (to her) many days. Her friend accidentally breathes too hard, and rocks the cart back and forth, back and forth.

AHHH! Stop that breathing! Get me off of this thing! I want out! Tell that guy to stop the next time we get down there . . . you're breathing again!

But the ride has only just begun. They still have 6 whole, long, everlasting turns to make — ones in which the 21 year-old's eyes are glued shut, nestled inside the shirt of her friend who's been dying from holding his breath.

Childish anticipation — it's still alive with me!

Support for research and police

I disagree with the demands of the those protesting military research on this campus and with much of the print given to their actions in the Collegian.

It is hard to believe that Graeme Thomson's article was printed ("Blah, lukewarm politics," May 11). UMass a police state? I am tired of all the complaints about the UMass police. They have a thankless job. Their actions in dealing with the protesters have been appropriate. Neither the students nor the protesters should pass judgment on how the police do their job.

Certainly, the most disturbing part of Thomson's article was his comments about UMass "students." Who does he think he is, criticizing the study habits and social lives of all of us at UMass? I am sorry to disappoint him, but I happen to take my "stupid grades" very seriously. I apologize for trying to learn something while I am in college. His whole article was an attempt at sounding intelligent by using important sounding words, coupled with narrow-minded accusations.

With respect to the Collegian, your reporting consistently portrayed the protesters as martyrs. Regardless of their cause, they have violated University policy and possibly State law. Instead of giving unsigned editorials reflecting the views of a few, the Collegian should show the views of the student body.

The Department of Defense provides vital funds for the University. I support this military funded research. Protesting should be done over real problems. Students should protest the fact that there is so little access for disabled students. They should protest the fact that the SGA gets nothing accomplished. The budget cuts should be protested even more than before. The protesters demand for this, but a demand is not a solution.

The voices of UMass students should be heard. But as in the case of Graeme Thomson, they should think twice before they speak.

Any graffiti defaces

From downtown Harlem to the side of the Morrill Science Building here at UMass, graffiti has become more than gang names scribbled on the wall, or declarations of eternal love. Graffiti has become a loudspeaker for all kinds of political and social views to be amplified.

With a mere can of spray paint, people embed their views upon buildings, not other people, and therefore damage and deface instead of making an impression upon the human race.

The sayings "Eat the rich," "Materialism is substance abuse" and "Quarantine Separatists" are indeed allusive. These profound statements are most likely a mystery not only to the viewer, but also to the writer. There is no direct message, and probably no response from the masses is expected.

So what good comes from placing these obtuse sayings on buildings, bridges and the like? Why do these people insist on writing this stuff that goes unheeded for the most part? Is the graffiti an honest attempt to make the average Joe take a stand, or is it one depraved person's hobby or bad sense of humor? Graffiti may get some passing attention, but who takes it seriously?

I hear and read about vandalized buildings, and the expense the owner takes on to have it cleaned off. It is not cheap. The buildings are molested because they are highly visible, seen by many passers-by. There are also those buildings that are vandalized because the owner has an extremely unacceptable view toward a group or an issue.

Yet, the people in question are not walking around with spray painted bodies. The building takes the rap. Since when is a building political? How about a soda machine? I was in Springfield last week and saw "Boycott Coke" in bold, black letters across the body of the dispenser. We all understand the need for US businesses to leave South Africa. Coca-Cola is, and should be, a prime target. But the slogan was crudely enlarged. It not only defaces the machine, but also turns people off from the entire matter.

The supporters of the boycott should continue the boycott, but the zealousness of defacing machines is unnecessary. The flyers put up next to the dispensers here are effective and show not only the need for the boycott, but taste and class as well.

"Liberals suck" with the response "Conservatives blow" is yet another example of political graffiti. This is not even slightly leaving any semblance of an insight into bipartisanism. The state of Democratic and Republican antics has fizzled even from the SGA to the mere scribbles of two people with set, open-minded views of what is right. The two parties are already split by their beliefs, so why this ridiculous doodling? The parties have to work together to get anything accomplished, but this graffiti is promoting anything but cooperation. No one wants to deal with the utter stupidity of the antics of government, let alone the meaningless dribble of uninformed extremists.

Graffiti defaces. It is not beautiful, or anything to be proud of . The carving of your sweethearts' name into the oak tree is obsolete. Life and politics is deeper than love. Or is it? The political sayings which are smeared over the walls and building should not be taken seriously.

Wait a minute, I forgot. They already are.

Safety in flying is a myth

While there may be irrefutable statistical evidence that there are more car accidents than plane accidents, I'd still argue that regardless of such statistical revelations — you are still safer on the ground than thirty thousand feet above sea level.

An assumption is made, supported solely on the basis of statistical information, that air travel is safer than ground travel because of the rate of accidents on the ground is greater than in the air. This fails to take into account the relevant information that might significantly alter its conclusion.

Simply because there are fewer plane accidents than car accidents does not, in my estimation, translate into a greater margin of safety.

While it may be true that there are just as many people in the air as on the ground at any given moment, I wonder if there are as many planes in the air as on the ground? The area of space for planes to maneuver far exceeds the road space allotted for cars. Planes, unlike automobiles, have the option of flying at different heights. More room to maneuver translates into fewer accidents. I wonder if the space allowed for travel were equal for both, would cars still maintain a disproportionate number of accidents? How would these considerations affect the statistical data? I suspect that the incidence of plane accidents would increase much more that of car accidents, thus ending any notion of plane safety superiority.

Statistics are a primary source of reassurance for national and international flyers. I was always under the suspicion that statistics were simply little white lies told by little white computers. I was never the type of person to allow statistics to have the final word on any topic. For example, according to statistics, pro baseball player, Wade Boggs is a superior hitter than baseball player, Don Mattingly. Yet, if I were the general manager of an expansion franchise, I would not hesitate in choosing Mattingly over Boggs because regardless of the stats, I know that Mattingly is the better offensive player.

What are car accidents caused by? It would be safe to assume that car accidents as a whole, are not likely to occur on a day when the conditions of the road and driver are excellent. If I were to speculate on the causes of car accidents, I would be inclined to say that driving under the influence of a controlled substance would be a major contributor to car accidents.

Mechanical problems, such as a blown tire would still have to be included as a cause of car accidents. However, a mechanical failure to the degree of a loose bolt in a car could result in a disaster, a fender-bender, or nothing. The same bolt would immediately result in total annihilation in the sky.

Incompetence behind the wheel, such as sleeping, driving to endanger and speeding can add to the total causes of car accidents. Finally, how many accidents on the ground are due to inclement weather such as rain, hail, sleet and snow? Controlling the variables that cause car accidents, is a Herculean task, but with the exception of weather and mechanical failure, all else could be eliminated as a cause.

As for planes and the presumed safety in flying, I ask you when was the last time you found a terrorist holding you at gun point in your Chevy? When was the last time that your Cutlas exploded because of a plastic explosive that was placed in your glove compartment? If a plane goes down at thirty feet, it's probably safe to say that the passengers is the are all going to make lovely fertilizer in the near future.

It seems like every time I turn on the television there has been another disaster in the sky. There may be more accidents on the ground, but does that necessarily mean that we are safer in the skies?

A dull afternoon at Southwest concert

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

Canned Heat, The Incredible Casuals, Phish, The Atlantic Clarion Steel Drum Band Southwest Parking Lot 33
May 14

Everything was just very different this year at the annual Southwest Concert. The sound system was a bit weak, the energy level was mighty low, the crowd was awfully small and to top it all, the whole shindig was moved over to the playing field-turned parking lot adjacent to University Drive (it wasn't that wet, I played golf Saturday).

Perhaps the Southwest Area Government foresaw the poor turnout in light of the curious bookings, last-minute concert promotion and dispelled Elvis Costello rumors. But for whatever reason, for the most part, this show was a dog.

I heard a lot of jokes about Canned Heat this past week, mostly from people who only know that the band is old, gray and played at Woodstock. No matter. I know about "The Bear" (Bob Hite), who was an idol of English blues grandpa John Mayall. And I'm familiar with a good deal of their classic, boogie-blues (I've got their albums, learned some of their guitar riffs, the whole nine yards). But Bob Hite is dead, and the handful of people milling about the front of the stage late yesterday afternoon represented anything but a full fledged "Heat revival."

The less than steaming Canned Heat performance was hardly the lowpoint of the day however. Most upsetting was having to witness Phish, who at this point have begun to make people realize how incredible they really are, trudge through a set amidst such drearily lukewarm surroundings. I was really looking forward to seeing Trey Anastasio and his merry men, and went so far as to forsake the pleasure of sitting at my favorite barstool, in my favorite bar, enjoying several dozen or so Absolut and cranberries with my favorite female companion, in order to get to the show in time for both the guys from Vermont, and the Atlantic Clarion Steel Drum Band (who pulled off an okay set, despite the "What the hell are we doing here?" looks on their faces).

Phish are a great band, take it from me. But it just wasn't the same as a sweaty night at Sheehan's, or a sold-out club date at the Channel in Boston, and they knew it.

Okay . . . the real problem.

Now look . . . certain members of the Arts/Living staff made some strong statements last week, and as a result, they now lock their doors at night. Fine. In no way do I intend to make enemies, but . . . when the Incredible Casuals started churning out their pseudo-pop-rock-candy-ass-club-blues trash, I lost it.

Can you say lounge lizards?

Come on, couldn't we have just airlifted the house band right out of the Holiday Inn in Stoughton?

Just because a band has been around the area for awhile doesn't mean they should be booked second to the headliners on the same bill that includes the hottest group in northern New England. There's a certain amount of people that will dance at every show, no matter what's up on the stage, and that's good . . . but don't be foolish and judge these guys by the 50 or so people who were shakin' it up all afternoon.

The bottom line is the place was dead. A few hundred at the most I'd say, and it wasn't that overcast either. With the exception of Phish, the bands just didn't cut it, and the SWAG history of booking "safe" acts for its spring show finally backfired. No offense (my pitiful little disclaimer) but it was a sinking ship from the day the show was "kinda" announced. Fitting as it may seem, the third in a series of disappointing spring jams, I would have liked to see something with a little more heart, and a lot more class. I'm funny that way.

Talerman's farewell

By JASON TALERMAN
Collegian Staff

And now the psychoses begin. I hit the bricks and put six years of post-teen security behind me. A lot of quality angst went down but it's all gonna be washed away when the summer is done and I'm found in my dirt floor cellar twitching amidst a pile of rejection letters. It is at that point that I'll realize exactly why there are so many shirt salesmen in this world. Anyway I got one last shot at this, a farewell address, so to speak. There is some brutal twisting of truth to follow so pay close attention.

Good and evil, is there a difference? — S. Gregory and M. Dalbec, JQA

I climbed the narrow, wisdom littered stairs of South College to find some appropraiate answers for this one. All the way to the top to David Lenson's office. David's slightly bent worldly knowledge could not unlock the doors though. Together we tried to drag Neitzche into the arena but it was late in the day and with finals creeping up we couldn't afford the nightmares. We found some scant parallels to George C. Scott's performance in Day of the Dolphin but the hunt stopped there.

I figure that analogy is the best tool here. I'm getting increasingly annoyed with rhetoric, which only seems to increase in frequency with age. Thus, I analogize with appropriate material, maggots. Today, to form fit our needs we will talk of the adult, winged variety, the common housefly. The desires of flies are simple. They are two in number. Sure, flies are drawn to feces but it is light that they lust for. They become caught in the 60 watt bell jar, hungry and trapped, dried up from the inside out. But for those few shining moments in the tungsten glow they must really know the difference between good and evil. The light is oh so lovely but, once inside, I bet they'd give it all up for a chance to get back into the shit. We will never know that feeling, at least not until that big fat atom bomb storms down upon us.

Most good analogies can be founded in basic life forms. I knew that flies were the answer but I had to seek them out in order to really understand them. It's early yet for fly season so I headed down to the Amherst carnival where the little pests congregated en masse. Pioneer Valley flies are a tame lot but flies everywhere recognize carnivals as easy prey. The food is bad enough but it's the carnies themselves that get the flies whipped into as frenzy. They confuse the smell of that grease soaked flesh for actual decaying tissue. The flying maggots hang like thunderheads over the carnies. They follow them everywhere. The buzzing echoing from the porta-potties is deafening. I observed all this from afar knowing that it takes only a slight hand gesture from one of those freaks to send about 6000 anthrax spores sailing in all directions.

Speaking of anthrax...My role, small as it may be, has been greatly confused during this whole spring season of political unrest. Good and evil applies here too and the picture doesn't change much. The mire is thick and it stinks. The light is of the bright white variety, full of goodness and hope. The maggots are omni-present. From a distance they look like one solid undualting milky white mass but up close you can see the disarray. Hundreds of teeming little bodies climbing all over eachother, reaching out for the sun.

I'm not gonna waste any line length with the Republican Club's role in this. I think the good ole boys are involved in this simply because they perceive the women on the scene to be of the young and vulnerable variety. Several key members of the alliance are locked into a death struggle because they know that the all time point record for conquests is within reach. Playoff rules are in effect. It's dog eat dog. My female co-workers here at the Collegian have taken to wearing body armor to protect themselves. Whatever heckling they can get in is just an added bonus. No mistake about it though, a finely honed sense of humor is rare and to be treated with great care. My liberal veins run long and deep and are just elastic enough for me to realize that the real crime would be in not respecting the enemy. It also helps that the enemy is the only group here that has enough sense to realize that good jokes are an effective vehicle for the meat of the matter.

Not that I'm saying this whole mess is a funny matter. It isn't. Military research has definitely got to be re-evaluted. Though much money is spent on misunderstood, beneficial research far too much goes out to ridiculous projects. Top scientists agree that SDI is out of reach, the Stealth is a billion dollar mistake, and chemical weapons break every tenet of humanity that mankind has laid down for itself. And Christ, why do we even have a marine core? The mindset of most marines alone is good enough reason to reactivate the leper colonies for their relocation.

What is funny is the naivete that's been going down. It's springtime and passions are running high. It seems a little out of place to see kids jumping out of their Volkswagon GTI's and treating Amherst cops like Nazi stormtroopers. I believe that unrest can only be good for a college campus but I do think that the goings on here have definitely degenerated into "slumber party" status. At any rate, if people continue to act without doing their homework they're just going to set themselves up for assholes like me gnaw on their bones. My career depends on it.

CELEBRATE DIVERSITY

The retaining wall opposite the east entrance of the Campus Center will soon be the site of a mural to commemorate last year's Civility Week and create a permanent message that addresses the importance of continued civility awareness and progress. The idea for a civility mural came from Environmental Design major Jon Satz. A competition among students in the Art, Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning, and Afro-American Studies departments was conducted by the Arts Council, the Graduate Art Students Association (GASA,) and UARTS, the Art Department's undergraduate art students organization. Design proposals were juried by students from the Art and Landscape Architecture departments and the Third World Caucus, faculty, and staff. The design of a graduate art student, Jonathan Kohrman, was selected. He will start to paint the mural in early May. A series of scenes will depict University community members from many constituencies socializing, working, and learning together. University members may actually serve as models for some of the figures in the mural. During its creation we encourage you to stop and speak with the artist.

■ men's lacrosse seeded seventh in tourney, hosts Cornell

Corrigan also said that sites had nothing to do with the way the tournament was seeded.

"Sometimes the teams are jockeyed around because of geography, but we were able to stay within the true seeds," Corrigan said.

But one has to wonder. With this year's tournament being played at Maryland, the Terrapins, with a bye into the quarterfinal, wouldn't have to budge out of College Park. Hmm.

So here the Gorillas sit, in the lucky seven spot, ready to face the team it has faced more than any other in the last two years.

"We'll have a scouting report on them. If we think of one game we could have won, that would be it," Kirkpatrick said. "We gave them a three-goal lead by playing the wrong defense, and we didn't play that well coming back from California."

Kirkpatrick admitted that the team was gearing up for the likes of Towson, Penn or Michigan State. "[Cornell is] not one of the teams we'd have liked to face."

As expected Syracuse, Johns Hopkins and Loyola held down the top three spots, followed by Maryland, Adelphi, North Carolina and UMass. Navy is seeded eighth and Penn, with its big win over UNC moved up to ninth. Cornell, Towson State and Michigan State round out the tourney field.

Towson State won a fierce battle among six teams for the 11th spot. According to Corrigan, it was a contest involving such teams as Yale, Virginia, Duke, Brown and Hofstra, but Towson prevailed because of its stunning double-overtime win over Hopkins last weekend.

"If they hadn't had that win over Johns Hopkins, they wouldn't be in the field," Corrigan said of Towson.

Michigan State got the 12th seed as an automatic bid from the West, a unanimous choice with victories over the other contending schools: Notre Dame, Air Force and Ohio State.

Therefore, the other matchups for Wednesday will pit Michigan State against Adelphi at Garden City, NY; Towson State vs. North Carolina at Chapel Hill, NC; and Penn and Navy at Annapolis, MD.

If UMass beats Cornell Wednesday, it will then move on to play number two seed Hopkins next Sunday in Baltimore.

If there is any justice it is that teams like Virginia, which hovered around the .500 mark all season, were excluded despite the conception that it plays a killer schedule.

"[Virginia] only had one big victory, and that was the one against Navy," Corrigan said. "The loss to Hofstra hurt them, and when it got down to the end it was a tough call for the committee."

"HOW I MADE $18,000 FOR COLLEGE BY WORKING WEEKENDS."

As soon as I finished Advanced Training, the Guard gave me a cash bonus of $2,000. I'm also getting another $5,000 for tuition and books, thanks to the New GI Bill.

Not to mention my monthly Army Guard paychecks. They'll add up to more than $11,000 over the six years I'm in the Guard.

And if I take out a college loan, the Guard will help me pay it back—up to $1,500 a year, plus interest.

It all adds up to $18,000—or more—for college for just a little of my time. And that's a heck of a better deal than any car wash will give you.

THE GUARD CAN HELP PUT YOU THROUGH COLLEGE, TOO. SEE YOUR LOCAL RECRUITER FOR DETAILS, CALL TOLL-FREE 800-638-7600,* OR MAIL THIS COUPON.

When my friends and I graduated from high school, we all took part-time jobs to pay for college.

They ended up in car washes and hamburger joints, putting in long hours for little pay.

Not me. My job takes just one weekend a month and two weeks a year. Yet, I'm earning $18,000 for college.

Because I joined my local Army National Guard.

They're the people who help our state during emergencies like hurricanes and floods. They're also an important part of our country's military defense.

So, since I'm helping them do such an important job, they're helping me make it through school.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Nothing seems particularly urgent this week. Harmony returns to a close relationship. Romance is tinged with optimism. Speculative financial activities could be risky. Stick to the tried-and-true.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) A windfall is possible, including a steady flow of cash. New admirers and a chance to travel brighten your day. Catch up on your correspondence. Someone at a distance has valuable information.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Substantial career gains are possible now. A change of diet boosts your energy level. A remodeling project will increase the value of an apartment or house. Work to improve a parent-child relationship.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Improve communications and your earnings will increase. Working too long without a break leaves you lethargic. Take a nap before going out for the evening. Better yet, stay home.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) You can press your plans with success today. Just postpone making any major financial decisions. A lesson learned in the past serves you well. Compromise will increase a relationship's longevity.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Emotions run high in the workplace today. Try to keep a low profile. Have lunch with someone special. New products can be time-savers and economical, too.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) A raise or promotion could be right around the corner. Show mate how interested you are in a special project. Music can be a great comfort, helping you through a tough period.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Things begin to turn around at school or work. You have new hope for a special project. Money matters get a friendly boost. Partner shares some very good news. Celebrate quietly.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Your long-range planning pays off both financially and emotionally. Fun activities put you in the limelight. You savor every minute of the attention you get. Share the applause with the deserving.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Details are less important than the end result. Visualize what you want to accomplish and you can make your dream come true. You love the attention you get from making a public appearance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Showcase your ideas to attract the attention of decision-makers. Looking your best helps you feel good. Tie up loose ends at work before heading home this evening. Leave nothing to chance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) A surge of energy helps you nail down important details. Good health is linked to daily exercise. A romance creates excitement within the family circle. Only you can decide who is right for you.

Pitcher Kim Corbin's two-run single struck down the mighty Minutewomen, but what was just as crucial was the continual calls against UMass. On a routine fielder's choice, the base umpire ruled that Duff had not touched the second base bag, setting up Corbin's big hit.

UMass began its stay in Jersey with a game against who else but Penn State. The Minutewomen broke a classic pitcher's duel between All-Conference selection Aprile and Kaminsky. Meehan, the ex-UMass All-Conference pick, knocked home sophomore catcher Cherie DellAnno from second in the sixth inning.

Meehan finished the championships with an impressive 6-for-12 performance at the plate and that earned her tournament MVP honors. "I feel this year that I did better in key situations and hit better for average (.324) than last year," she said.

The first-round victory set up a matchup between the first and second seeds, Temple and UMass. The two teams had split their regular season series one apiece and both had their best pitchers on hand, Aprile for UMass and Kathy McCarthy for the Lady Owls.

For UMass, the strategy was to crowd the plate against McCarthy. "If we crowded the plate, we knew we could hit her because we were taking away her best pitch. To hit an outside pitch, if you try to pull the ball, it'll be a weak hit," Wanner said.

Two sophomore infielders, second baseman Jennifer Miller and third baseman Chris Collins, provided key RBI singles and again the Minutewomen was helped out, this time courtesy of two errors by Dionna Harris, the A-10's first Player of the Year.

UMass will return to the NCAAs for the second time in four years and Meehan says it's definitely not under the same circumstances. "It feels really different," said Meehan. "When we were freshmen, we were expected to do well but this team had no pressure to win." Wanner agreed and added, "It's great to see such a young team come together like this."

The softball team continued its Cinderella season by winning the Atlantic 10 championship yesterday.

Jordan shrugs off injury, scores 47 in Chicago win

CHICAGO (AP) — Irrepressible Michael Jordan, groin injury and all, scored 47 points yesterday to lead the Chicago Bulls to a 106-93 victory over the New York Knicks and a 3-1 lead in their best-of-7 NBA playoff series.

The Bulls can wrap it up with a victory in New York tomorrow night. If not, the sixth game will be played in Chicago next Thursday night.

Hobbling at the start with a strained left groin, Jordan kicked his game into high gear in the fourth quarter when he scored 18 of his points.

After Kiki Vandeweghe scored for the Knicks to cut Chicago's lead to 81-79, Jordan scored a basket, added a free throw and then set up Scottie Pippen for another basket and an 86-79 lead.

Jordan then scored eight of Chicago's next 10 points for a 96-90 lead with three minutes to play. And he capped the victory with a three-point play with 1:33 left for a 101-92 margin.

Bill Cartwright scored 21 points for the Bulls, 19 in the first half and two more on free throws with 2:24 left in the game for a 98-92 lead.

Johnny Newman, held scoreless Saturday, led the Knicks with 23 points.

With all five starters scoring, led by Mark Jackson's six points, the Knicks took an early 15-10 lead. But Jordan and Cartwright led a 12-3 run, putting the Bulls ahead 22-18. New York's only points came on a 3-point basket by Trent Tucker.

A three-point play by Cartwright and a pair of free throws by Charles Davis gave Chicago a 27-21 lead but two free throws by Newman ended the first period with Chicago holding a 27-23 advantage.

Chicago led 27-23 going into the second period and built their lead to six points, the last at 41-35. The Knicks then got a 3-point basket by Newman, two baskets by Charles Oakley and another by Jackson for a 9-0 run and a 44-41 lead.

Chicago came back with an 8-1 run to move out front again and led at the half 55-53.

Ewing tied the game at the start of the second half and Newman's 3-pointer gave the Knicks a 58-57 lead. The lead changed hands twice more and there were two more ties before Jordan put Chicago in front 71-67.

The Bulls led 77-73 at the end of the third period and the Knicks never caught up.

Sox fall again to Seattle

SEATTLE (AP) — Jim Presley snapped a sixth-inning tie with a run-scoring double and rookie Omar Vizquel hit a two-run triple as the Seattle Mariners beat the Boston Red Sox, 4-3 yesterday in the Kingdome.

Ellis Burks had tied the score 3-3 in the sixth inning with a solo home run, his sixth, off starter Erik Hanson.

Mike Boddicker, 2-4, walked the first two batters in the Seattle sixth before leaving with a pulled back muscle. Reliever Mike Smithson relieved and got two outs before Presley doubled.

Steve Trout, 3-2, pitched two scoreless innings in relief of Hanson for the victory and Mike Schooler finished for his eighth save.

With Seattle trailing 2-0, Presley walked and Dave Valle singled with one out in the fifth. Vizquel followed with a two-run triple to left and scored on Harold Reynolds' sacrifice fly.

With one out in the first, Marty Barrett singled and moved to third on Burks' double. Mike Greenwell then hit a two-run single to put the Red Sox up 2-0.

Softball team grabs A-10 crown

The UMass softball captured the Atlantic 10 conference championship yesterday, beating Penn State in New Brunswick, NJ.

Minutewomen knock off Penn State in title game; third crown in four years

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. — For most of the season, the spotlight's been on the underclassmen on the team, namely new sensation Holly Aprile. The two senior co-captains, Christine Wanner and Barbara Meehan, didn't mind not getting the attention.

Atlantic 10 Tournament

But in the final game of the Atlantic 10 tournament, it was Wanner who got the call from head coach Elaine Sortino and responded with a four-hit shutout over third-seeded Penn State to capture UMass' third A-10 championship and a NCAA tournament bid.

"I was strong and determined," said Wanner. "Holly had pitched the first three games and I didn't know what to expect, but I was mentally ready for anything."

Wanner had set down the side in the first two innings, while her offense generated two runs for her to protect. "Starting off the first two innings strong was a real pick-me up," said Wanner. It was only fitting that Wanner scored the eventual winning run in the second. Like any good team, the Minutewomen capitalized on the other team's mistakes and then made it hurt.

Wanner had caught a big break, as left fielder Julie Taylor dropped an easy fly ball. She moved into scoring position on Cathy Kaminski's wild pitch and then junior shortstop Mary Duff got her usual bunt single while moving Wanner over to third. Wanner ended up scoring the unearned run on Kaminsky's second wild pitch. Duff would later score on a Bonnie Schilling squeeze bunt.

Wanner got her chance as the Minutewomen lost the yesterday's first game to Penn State, 4-2. Starter Holly Aprile was literally battered in the first as she was struck and cut under the same right eye which she injured earlier in the season. Aprile explains, "I thought I had the ball, so I dropped my glove." She went down hard and quick, but showed her toughness by staying in the game. In the next couple of innings, Aprile ran into some trouble, losing some of her control. She said, "I was pressing too hard and overthrowing," adding that the cut didn't really affect her too much.

It was in the fifth where UMass trailed for the first time in the tourney, as the Lady Lions scored two off Aprile.

Gorillas 7th; Cornell here on Wednesday

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Proving that anything is possible as long as the NCAA is involved, the pairings for the postseason men's lacrosse tournament were released yesterday with a few surprises.

The University of Massachusetts, which most people in this general locale were predicting for anywhere between fourth and sixth, found itself in a disappointing seventh spot. The Gorillas, 12-2, will host Cornell, the tournament's 10th seed, Wednesday afternoon in the opening round of the tournament.

The game time will not be announced until sometime today, and it has not been decided where the game will be played. UMass coach Dick Garber put in a request to play at Boyden Hill as a first choice, but that is dependent on acceptance from the NCAA. If not, it will be at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

This will be the second year in a row and the fourth time in the last two seasons that UMass and the Big Red will clash. Cornell has won the last two meetings, beating the Gorillas 13-11 here in the opening round of last year's tournament, and then handing UM one of its two losses of the year, 12-11 on March 29 at The Hill.

The seventh seed is surprising in that UMass could have been seeded as much as two spots higher. The Gorillas were tied with the University of Maryland for sixth in last week's United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association poll, but Maryland rocketed up to the fourth spot in the tourney, a difference of three spots.

UMass also could have moved ahead of the University of North Carolina, which finished 11-4 including a 13-7 loss to the University of Pennsylvania on Saturday. However, that wasn't enough to drop the Tarheels below UMass either.

"I saw North Carolina and Penn and they're both good teams," said UMass assistant Steve Kirkpatrick, who saw the UNC-Penn game at Chapel Hill. "And we're at least as good as them. I thought after that game that we'd be fifth or sixth. But never in my wildest dreams did I think we'd be seventh."

Garber could not be reached last night for comment.

"We took the strength of schedule into the rankings," said Gene Corrigan, chairman of the NCAA Lacrosse Committee. "Neither UMass nor North Carolina beat anyone in the field, but North Carolina played more teams in the field."

UMass had played only Syracuse and Cornell, and the Gorillas lost those games by a goal each. North Carolina lost to Maryland, Hopkins, Syracuse and Penn.

Corrigan also said that Maryland played more teams in the tournament compared to both UMass and Adelphi, and moved up because of the strength of its schedule, despite its record of 9-3.

"And they came a long way from last year," Corrigan said of Maryland's turnaround from not being in the tournament in 1988.

Suspensions remain after negotiations

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Negotiations between protesters and University of Massachusetts administrators, aimed at lifting suspensions placed on arrested students, broke down yesterday.

"Essentially, the whole thing fell apart," Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs, said. "Some people flat out lied about following up on the campus advisory. It angers me — I'm tired of trying to work in a respectful way and they are not being respectful by lying."

The demonstrators refused to sign an administrative agreement which committed them to community service and rejected a promise to abide by the picketing code through the end of the semester.

The community service would have served as the disciplinary process and restitution for the expenses incurred in making the arrests that resulted from the five occupations protesting military-funded research on campus and the disciplinary action taken by the administration, according to Chancellor Joseph Duffey.

The administration and students disagreed on what constitutes community service.

"As far as we're concerned, we've been doing community service for a month," Randy Viscio, a Hampshire College student who has been banned from UMass, said. "We've raised awareness and consciousness in the whole community."

Madson, however, said occupying buildings "is not community service."

Loyda Guzman, a suspended UMass student, said an admission of guilt can be used against students who face criminal charges in Northampton District Court.

"We didn't sign the administrative agreement because by signing it we are admitting guilt," Frank Bowrys, a suspended UMass student said.

Duffey issued a campus advisory last Friday, stating that each student involved in the arrest-related disciplinary process could meet with JoAnne Thomas Vanin, dean of students, to decide together what community service the students would perform, and the extent of the service.

Five hunger strikers, protesting the interim suspensions placed on the students who were arrested in the Graduate Research Center occupation, and three other students signed a statement over the weekend, stating they would not violate the code for the duration of the semester and would continue to demonstrate community service.

"One example of our efforts in this regard is the flowering dogwood that was planted by our group and PSRU [People for a Socially Responsible University] during a candlelight vigil on May 12," the statement said.

Protester held at County Jail

By NATHAN KRYSTALL

Bail was set at $10,000 yesterday at Northampton Superior Court for the release of Timothy Sauvageau, a University of Massachusetts student who was arrested last Thursday during the second Memorial Hall occupation.

Sauvageau, also arrested at the Graduate Research Center occupation two weeks ago, has been held in the Hampshire County jail since his arraignment early Thursday morning, because of his refusal to identify himself before the District Court.

All of the other 150 protesters who were arrested for opposing military funded research at the University have been released on their own recognizance.

Saying Sauvageau showed disrespect for the court, Judge John Moriarty set the high bail to ensure that Sauvageau would be present at the trial.

"He has treated with such disrespect the District Court downstairs," said Moriarty,". . . that I'm not sure that he'll show up for the court date if they release him on his own recognizance."

"Under the circumstances it will be a substantial bail," Moriarty said.

The judge reminded the court that last week Sauvageau was carried into the district court by court officers. Sauvageau had been engaging in passive resistance but yesterday he walked in and out of the courtroom on his own volition.

Sauvageau gave another student, Diana Ditmore, per-

Poet, entomologist receive award

By MANOS STEFANAKOS

The ballots have been counted and there are two winners: University of Massachusetts professors Ring Carde, an entomologist, and James Tate, a poet, are this year's recipients of the Distinguished University Professors Award.

The honor, established by the board of trustees in 1986, is designed to "recognize current faculty who are preeminent in their fields, as well as to attract outstanding faculty to the campus," said Stacey Chase, University spokeswoman.

The process includes a nomination from fellow faculty, a vote by the Faculty Senate, and subsequent approval from the trustees.

"I feel honored to be recognized by my peers, and lucky that I am involved in such a dynamic field," Carde said.

Carde studies "how insects use chemicals to communicate with each other," and the object of his research is to "use insect chemical attractants to monitor and manage insect populations," he said.

The ultimate purpose is to "develop a system that provides an alternative to chemical pesticides," many of which have been proven harmful to humans, Carde said.

"There are two kinds of people who become entomologists," Carde said. "One group is people who take entomology in college or high school and love it. The second is a group that has always had a fascination with insects. I am in the latter."

Carde said his early fascination with insects directed his career since his days at Tufts University, where he received his bachelor's degree in biology, and Cornell

Snowball suit thrown out of Superior Court

AMHERST (AP) – A Superior Court judge has tossed out a lawsuit in which Amherst College sought to force University of Massachusetts trustees to stop their students from throwing snowballs.

Amherst College President Peter R. Pouncey issued a statement yesterday that the college was considering an appeal, but he declined to return several telephone calls to his office.

"He does not want to speak publicly about the decision," said Douglas Wilson, the college's secretary for public affairs.

Judge John F. Moriarty found the annual snowball fight between students of the two schools, which traditionally follows winter's first snowfall in this New England college town, could and has led to property damage. But he said it was beyond the power of the court to prevent students from engaging in hijinks.

"However desireable an injunction against crime might be if it could be enforced, it is unfortunately beyond the power of the court comprised only of human judges," Moriarty said in his decision filed Friday in Northampton Superior Court.

Amherst officials had contended that in the past three years the 1,500-student private college had suffered $9,352 in broken windows when students from the 25,000-student state university surged across the Town Common. Last December, an Amherst student was hospitalized after being hit in the eye with an icy missile and 61 windows were broken, the suit said.

"Amherst College has a security force of 10 and as such is not equipped to deal effectively with 2,000 rioters from another institution," the college said in its suit.

"There have, during the past several years, been some true bullies among the crows of students from the University," Moriarty said in his decision. "Not content with the advantage of their numbers, they have resorted to enclosing stones or rocks in their snowballs in order to inflict greater damage upon their targets."

Black Mass Communications Project rocks on

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

Twenty years ago, after the first takeover of what became the New Africa House, three media-oriented RSOs emerged.

One was a newspaper, one was a magazine and the third was involved with radio. The last was Black Mass Communications Project.

BMCP, which operates out of WMUA nightly, plays African, African-American and African-Caribbean music, according to Desmond Dorsett, the group's promotions director. He added that its success at the station results from the wide influence that African music has on other forms of music, such as popular music.

"All of the so-called 'European music' is based upon . . . African-American rhythms," Dorsett said.

He also said artists such as Michael Jackson are proof that "our music sells."

BMCP has been successful in the radio station, he said, citing the election of BMCP member and former Third World Affairs director Kevin Mitchell to WMUA programmer.

"I think BMCP is definitely going to rise because there are two members in station management' since Trent Watson was named the station's third world affairs director, Mitchell said.

While BMCP broadcasts out of the WMUA studios, it operates independently of the station, acquiring its albums through the record companies, Dorsett said.

As an RSO, the group receives funding through the Student Activities Trust Fund. This year, according to SGA Budgets Committee co-chairperson Karen Talbot, the group will receive $7,969 for fiscal year 1990, a $208 increase from last year.

The group has not always been this lucky. According to Watson, business manager, funding over the past five years was cut between $5,000 and $6,000.

"In order to compensate for the losses, [it has been necessary to] generate our own revenue," he said, adding that events such as last week's Funk-a-thon and the annual Jeans and T-shirt parties have helped raise revenue. The Funk-a-thon, for example, earned the group about $3,000, Watson said.

Mitchell said that revenues from Funk-a-thons could have been higher if stricter rules by the Department of Public Safety had not been enforced. "In 1987, there was some violence at a Funk-a-thon, which was caused by non-students. Since then, the Department of Public Safety has pushed times back earlier," he said.

Mitchell said he is optimistic about the project's future, and that video programming, with public affairs and music video shows, will be on the air when the University installs its cable system.

"With the new installation of the cable system in the dorms, BMCP can be in the vanguard in programming," he said.

Students store stuff over summer

Growing school locker business comes to town

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

For international students, out-of-state students, or students who don't want to drag all their supplies home for the summer, Student Storage Co. may have the answer.

The company, begun three years ago by Vassar College student Kael Goodman, provides students with boxes and storage space for the summer in locked trailers parked in Westfield, said Andrea Proia, an employee of Student Storage Co.

"We've been successful in Boston and Philadelphia," Proia said yesterday. "This is the first year we're doing schools in Providence, Rhode Island and Western Mass."

For $16, a student can buy a 4.3 cubic ft. box, and store it in a trailer for the summer, Proira said.

"A student will probably pay $50 to $60 to store everything," Proira said. "There is an unlimited number of trailers at each pick-up location on campus, so students can bring as much as they want to bring."

For $8 to $15 , students can bring their own boxes and suitcases to the trailers, which will be in Central, Northeast and Southwest from May 22 to May 25, from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m., Proira said.

Proira said the company is not responsible for loss or damage to property, but students can pay between $1.75 to $100 to insure their items.

Students who only want to buy boxes can purchase them for $3 on the Campus Center concourse until Wednesday, Proira said.

"I've sold four boxes today," Proira said. "We usually sell a lot more boxes when people are actually packing."

Student Storage Co. will accept several unboxed items, including tables, rolled up rugs, mattresses and small items of furniture, as long as there's room in trailer, Proira said.

However, they will not accept mirrors or lamps, she said.

Proira said students can pick up their belongings during an assigned three-hour time slot, from Sept. 4 to Sept. 6, at the same place they dropped them off in the spring.

Students will be given a pick-up date on their invoice when they bring their belongings to the trailers, Proira said.

Ninja Turtles, Batman mean business

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

The comic book business is booming, said George Brace, co-owner of Crossroads Comics in Amherst.

The business usually pulls in between $100 to $200 in the two days per week that he and partner John Wisly sell their wares on the Campus Center Concourse, Brace said.

Brace said that he and Wisly, a junior at the University of Massachusetts, started selling comic books on the streets last September, then moved into the Amherst store in January.

"John has always read a ton of comics," Brace said. "And he's always looking for a new business to go into. I joined him because I thought it would be fun."

Crossroads Comics offers a variety of items, from superhero comics and underground comics, independent comics [not produced by Marvel or DC, the two largest comic book companies], and graphic novels, to games and t-shirts, Brace said.

Prices range from 75 cents to $4 for comic books, and $5 to $30 for graphic novels, Brace said.

Brace said the biggest selling comic books right now are the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtle series, and the Batman series.

"[The creators] of Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles are right here in Northampton, so we can get them whenever we want," Brace said. "And with the Batman movie coming out, the Batman comics are selling insanely right now."

Brace said that he and Wisly hope to expand the business, including opening more stores, creating a mail-

'Cutback City' draws fire

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

"Cutback City," once lauded as a symbol of student uprising against state budget cuts, is at the center of controversy sparked by claims that the city is now a safety hazard, not a symbol of the impoverished status of public higher education.

Administrators from the Department of Public Safety and Environmental Health and Safety yesterday said they are sympathetic to the students' efforts but added that the city continues to present dangerous conditions to students on campus.

Clarinda Rose-Turner, acting president of the Commuter Area Government, reported that she was walking through the city at 11 p.m. last Tuesday when a man attempted to lead her into one of the 11 huts.

Rose-Turner said she left the area unharmed, but joined several Undergraduate Student Senators at last week's meeting in support of a motion to relocate or remove the city from campus.

"Cutback City is unsafe. It's a fire hazard, an eyesore, and a hackneyed expression of protest," said Sen. W. Greg Rothman, one of five senators who proposed the motion.

The senate unanimously passed the motion and Senate Speaker John Dunlap said copies of the proposal have been circulated to administrators on campus to inform them of the senators' intent.

University of Massachusetts administrators could not be reached for comment yesterday in response to the senate's motion.

Don Robinson, director of Environmental Health and Safety, said the area is a fire hazard, citing a mysterious blaze that destroyed a teepee which once stood more than 10 feet high.

"We sympathize with the purpose, but we obviously have to be concerned about the safety of students on campus," Robinson said. "I would feel more comfortable if they [the huts] were gone."

City residents were issued one smoke alarm, which costs about $15 each, and one fire extinguisher, which costs about $30 each, per hut, mission to identify him for the court.

"'I gave Tim's name because I wanted to get him out," said Ditmore. "He's the one doing total non-cooperation. I'm not."

Sauvageau's attorney, Cristobal Bonifaz, requested that Sauvageau be released on his own recognizance.

Assistant District Attorney Leslie McLellan requested that the defendant be held on some amount of bail, citing an attempt at "flight to avoid prosecution."

McLellan said that because the District Attorney's office had been unable to identify Savageau, officials had not been able to check his records and family ties and to find out if he is a drug addicted person, information that is criteria for setting bail under the bail statutes.

Charles Lenchner, a UMass student who attended yesterday's hearing, said he thinks the bail was set so high because the judge was angered by the lack of respect for authority.

"I think that the judge finds the worst thing about it is that we don't give a shit about authority," said Lenchner, who was arrested at the first Memorial Hall occupation three weeks ago.

Memorial Hall

who had died in World War I. At that time, Memorial Hall was termed "the most sacred spot upon our campus" by MAC president, Kenyon L. Butterfield.

In 1923, the college published a booklet that defined acceptable behavior in the hall. According to these rules, silence, "dignity and seriousness" was expected of all those who entered the hall. More than 60 years later, the building represents something very different to people at the University of Massachusetts.

Joe Rubin, an activist involved in the student takeover of Memorial Hall, said the building is, in part, a memorial to those students who died in Vietnam. This serves as a reminder of the horror of war, he said.

"By taking over [Memorial Hall], we are making a statement that the University should be doing things to prevent war, not cause it," Rubin said.

Radical Student Union member Owen Broadhurst cited practical as well as symbolic reasons for the building takeover.

"There are practical reasons, such as the accessible windows, which made Memorial Hall a good choice," he said. "But there are symbolic reasons that are important as well. This building is a memorium for UMass amumni who have died in foreign wars. By taking over this building, we are saying we don't want to see any more UMass alumni killed in foreign wars."

At one time, the building was more than just a memorium for students, according to William Lane, business manager for Development and Alumni Affairs in Memorial Hall. In the 1920s and 1930s, student activities centered around the hall. A barber shop, pingpong tables and even a bowling alley were on the ground floor of the building. Many student organizations, including the Collegian, had their offices there as well.

"There were many functions that went on there such as dances and meetings," Lane said. "However, after the Student Union was built in the 1950s, it wasn't used as much."

For many, Memorial Hall represents something more than a center of student protest. Junior communications major Andrea Salvador said, "It is one of the places on campus where you know that there is a lot of tradition. It is bizarre to see a war memorial every day on a college campus. It makes you think of our history. In times of peace, it is a building that makes you realize the likelihood of war. Although it's a negative feeling, [the building] is an important symbol."

"A lot of things are fantasies, too," Brace said. "Our main plan is to get our feet firmly planted under us. We're far from being out of the woods."

"My partner says we'll be a million dollars in debt and own 50 stores by next year," said Brace.

Brace said they are also going to travel to comic book conventions in Stanford, Conn., Worcester, and Boston this summer to sell back issues.

"Back issues can get into thousands of dollars," Brace said. "Early Superman and Batman comics from the 1930s can go for $10,000. Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtle no. 1 is going for $160."

"The main fun part is dealing with things that we like," Brace said.

Students to attend Central Park rally

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Staff

The recent rape and assault of a 28-year-old woman in New York's Central Park has prompted two University of Massachusetts students to organize a delegation to a rally in the park later this month.

Tracy Feldstein and Charles Bailey, of the recently formed Coalition Against Rape and Violence at UMass, have arranged transportation to the May 25 event, sponsored by New York's United Against Violence, a coalition of organizations committed to reducing violence in the city.

Atchudta Bakr, coordinator of the New York-based sponsors, said the rally will address both domestic and social violence against women, and the alienation of the country's youth.

"Kids don't have too many options in our community," Bakr said, "and two of those options happen to be crime and drugs."

Feldstein, a part time student, learned of the New York rally while planning a "Take Back the Night" protest in response to the Central Park assault. She and Bailey then tried to generate interest in the New York rally.

The rally "is a matter of awareness," said Feldstein, who used to do independent rape counseling in Southwest residential area. "We want to let the public know that this kind of thing has to stop," she said.

Bakr said the rally will focus on social alternatives for children such as community centers, tutoring and extracurricular activities after school, and nurturing positive leadership and role models in children.

"As much as we point our fingers at these kids," Bakr said, "We are doing nothing to help them."

She said the rally will also address the issue of racism and how events such as the central park incident can divide, as well as unite a community.

Bakr said the media perpetuates racism and polarization in the city. "This woman has been in the papers for 23 or 24 days," Bakr said. "But Black and Latino women are raped daily, and nothing is reported."

The rally, scheduled from 5:30 to 8 p.m., is expected to draw 10,000 people. Bakr said there will be speakers, live entertainment, and educational resources available to help fight violence in the community.

Feldstein said tickets will be on sale today and tomorrow on the Campus Center Concourse for $17 each. Reduced rates may be available for those who cannot afford tickets.

"WHAT THE HECK, KID. . . . IT'S CLOSE ENOUGH FOR GOVERNMENT WORK!"

How to win the bronze

It is a mark of distinction, of social standing and of pride. It one is to march about campus carrying themselves with their head held high, gloating, one must work for it. If you work for it and succeed, you can stroll around campus placing yourself socially above the academic whiz that sustained a 4.0 over four years. You have more social prestige than the guy that was involved in every protest, takeover, boycott, sit in, march and sleepover that shocked and stunned UMass this year. Yes my friend, you know who you are. You are at the top of the social register because you sport the perfect tan.

Jon Z. Bowser

I am not speaking of the fair weather tanners that rush outside for an hour and then get bored and go to class. I'm not speaking of the people who will skip a day of classes to soak up some rays, to you guys tanning is merely a relaxing hobby. I'm speaking of the full time, competitive, professional tanners. You know who you are. We don't peel, burn, fade, singe, flake, pale or freckle. It's not just a hobby or a diversion, tanning is our life. We professional tanners follow the Tanners Guidebook, Second Edition, to the T. It is our tanning bible. Professional tanners show no tan lines in public: "You tan should cover no less than 89.7 percent of your body twelve months out of the year. (Tanner's Guidebook p. 23, section 3a)." Tan lines are considered declasse by those in the tanning circle of elites.

A professional tanner knows that tanning is God's sport and artifical means are not permitted. Tanning salons are to professional tanners what steroids are to Ben Johnson. Just to put some of you amateur tanners on the right track, I'll give you some tips on tanning taken from the Tanner's Guidebook.

White as ghost but the sun isn't out? That's no reason to pale and pout. The best time to catch a fast tan is when the sky is overcast. The clouds filter out nasty ultraviolet rays and you will tan quicker.

In between the toes pale as dough? The toes are tricky; the best way to separate the little buggers to let the sun shine in is to break toothpicks in half and wedge the toes apart. Notice when you blink your eyelids are pink? Just shutting your eyes would seem the easiest solution but even with your lids closed the sun can't tan under the natural wrinkles. You have to stretch the skin taut and smooth. Cosmetic tape is best but ordinary masking tape is cheaper.

Of course, if you're going to be dedicated to the sport of tanning you have to make sacrifices. This is an all encompassing, time consuming lifestyle, but the rewards speak for themselves. If you are just starting out as a tanner take it slow. A professional or even a semi-pro tan doesn't come overnight. Go out for an hour to try it out. If you start out doing five hours of heavy tanning you're risking burns, peeling and even welts. Avoid baby oil and large magnifying glasses; shortcuts don't work in the world of professional tanning. Over tanning yourself on your first day out may cause you to brown unevenly. Believe me, that is embarrassing. You have a natural potential to tan, so don't exceed your limits. If you're blonde or sandy blonde you're looking for a Sonny Bono Bronze. Some brunettes can attempt the Don Ho Special but most should settle on the Jolson Jasper -2 or -3. Go out there and work your own tan. Everyone is different, you have to build your relationship with the sun one on one. You risk possible sun poisoning and skin cancer, but what a small, insignificant price to pay. If you're a natural like me, you might be able to compete in the National Tan Off in West Palm Beach. From there, it's the International Competition against the legends of the game. Remember — a good tanner is a patient tanner.

A national war for control

Many columns have been written about the abortion issue this semester. Appropriate, considering the fact that the Supreme Court is reviewing the landmark case Roe v. Wade that legalized abortion. The Supreme Court could either overturn it, uphold it, or leave it up to the states to decide.

When I first heard the slogan "Keep your laws off our bodies," and discovered that the March on Washington (in April) was not only for abortion rights, but was a battle against female oppression, I was rather skeptical. I viewed the right to have an abortion as a woman's right, but I did not think that making it illegal would be oppressive to women's rights as a whole.

Meredith O'Brien

I found some shocking statistics and cases that changed my mind: during the 1980's, about 11 Caesarean sections were forced on pregnant women against their will by their husbands; pregnant women have been accused of fetal neglect and have been placed into protective custody, to protect the life of the fetus; women have been forced into pregnancy testings (and it has been suggested that there should be further, legal restraints on pregnant women; women were legally forced into sterilization; and before the Roe ruling, it was not uncommon for a doctor to demand sex before performing an illegal abortion. (Many illegal abortions rendered women sterile due to the unhealthy procedures. Everyone remembers the image of a coat hanger used to scrape the fetus out of the womb). Women had no control over their bodies.

The Klein case is a scary example.

On December 13, 1988, Nancy Klein, who was pregnant with her second child, was in a car crash that left her in a coma. The doctors told her husband that she would have a better chance of survival if her pregnancy were terminated. Two prolifers, who did not even know the Kleins, sued Mr. Klein for approving an abortion for his wife. They intruded into a family crisis where a woman could die if her pregnancy were continued (some pro-life stance), forcing their morals on the Kleins.

These supposed pro-lifers could force their morality upon women they don't even know, if Roe is overturned. Husbands could legally force their wives to have operations. Women would be helpless while their bodies would be legally subject to probing, prodding and a surgical knife. Stripping the rights of women to control their own bodies away from them, making abortion illegal, is definitely oppressive to women.

The ironic thing about these pro-life people is that they can not be in favor of life. If they were, they would not force women to give birth to unwanted babies.

"Adoption" is their key word. The people who advocate adoption are living in a dream world. Do they know how many babies, how many children are not adopted each year? There are plenty of children that no one wants to adopt. Most people who want to adopt are looking for nice little White babies with blonde hair and blue eyes. Well it's time to wake up. Most children who are left with those adoption agencies are not the ones in demand.

There are millions of children who were born unwanted and who are neglected. These children have no direction. They have parents who don't care. They could easily get hooked on drugs and become criminals. The number of homeless would escalate, welfare demands would increase, more citizens, less jobs, unemployment . . . if abortion were made illegal.

And these people preach about America's eroding family life.

When I walked by the rally last Friday where an Operation Rescue member was speaking. I was disgusted. I saw a man in a suit waving pictures of aborted fetuses at a group of women. He was preaching to women about how evil abortion is.

Abortion is not evil, over-population is evil. Poverty is evil. And so are unwanted children. Stripping women's right to control their own bodies is evil, it is disgusting. These piousest people should just keep their warped morals to themselves and out of other people's lives.

Fighting for civility

In the last two weeks there have been several incidents of harassment. They were directed against Jewish students and against lesbian, gay and bisexual students and staff and took the form of threatening letters. One of these letters contained a piece of a banner that had been stolen from the LBGA. The banner had been mutilated, and the mutilations included what appeared to be a bullet hole. Other letters threatened personal, direct violence.

No community as diverse as ours can tolerate damage engendered by ugly, anonymous, personal attacks such as these.

As a University community we can show our concern for targeted people and our dissociation from those who commit these acts. Dependence on anonymity must be named for the cowardice that it is. The sickness these acts represent must be deplored. The perpetrators must be confronted. I urge any member of the campus with information about these letters to report their information to the Dean of Students, or the Director of Public Safety.

Even without the additional tensions we are experiencing, the end-of-the-semester period is a stressful one. I invite all students, staff and faculty to work in concert to help heal the wounds these tensions and acts have created.

This is it, readers; Rusty Denton is signing off

Well, this is it. I don't know what you'll read now for grief and aggravation, or what I'll do without your outraged criticisms, but after 10 consecutive semesters and something like 120 columns, I'm retiring from these pages.

I didn't enter this forum intending to achieve notoriety, and I've never quite figured out how to deal with it, so until now I've routinely ignored requests from my editors to provide you with biographical information. However, this is a sign-off, so I suppose you have a right to know more than just my opinions.

My full name is Frank Russell Denton III and I'll be 32 in a month. I've been married five years and I have a 13-month-old son (James Elias); my beautiful, gracious and incredibly knowledgable wife is two months pregnant. Yes, she actually agrees with my politics. No, we never had premarital sex. Yes, our babies were planned. Yes, we have a great relationship; since we don't believe in divorce or apathy, we're very motivated that way.

I'm an Eagle Scout. I write music and lyrics — gospel, of course — and play a 12-string guitar. I was an undergrad on this campus for ten semesters; lived in Butterfield the whole time. In 1980 I received three simultaneous bachelor's degrees (a first for UMass) in biochemistry, botany, and German. At present all I need for a master's degree in organic chemistry is paperwork, and I hope to write and defend a doctoral dissertation in organic before another semester has passed.

I'm affiliated with the Amherst Area New Testament Church, a pentecostal congregation. Sometime in the next couple of years I hope to get a permanent chemical job in West Africa and begin working with an African pastor starting churches in my free time.

Rusty Denton

It's not easy to put one's life on paper, but there it is.

One of the most frequent criticisms I've heard as a columnist is that I seem to think that God is on my side. We'll ignore the fact that most Americans who believe in God think He shares their politics. We'll forget that if some part of the Bible contradicts those politics, they assume God didn't write that part.

But okay, it's true; I believe God is on my side. I don't apologize. Unlike some, I didn't arrive at that belief by assuming that God must be like me. I came to it by examining what the Bible has to say about various issues, and then adopting political positions that reflect biblical priorities. I have tried to be on God's side, and if that were controversial, so be it.

Many on campus don't seem to realize that in the biblical narrative, it is the false prophets who confine themselves to politically acceptable rhetoric, whereas the guy everybody hates is the one telling them what God is really saying. I don't think my columns ought to be canonized as holy writ, but I'm not about to be intimidated by public opinion, either. I have a higher authority to answer to, and so do you.

I realized quite a while ago that God had a just case against me, and I also realized that nothing I did to try and reform worked; that's human nature. Somebody told me that God sent Jesus Christ to die to pay the price for my sins, if only I repented and believed. Having nothing better on the horizon, I invited Jesus into my life, and that has made all the difference. I am bold not because of who I think I am, but because I am not what I was. My fear, my self-loathing, and my weakness in the face of temptation are gone. In their place I have found a way to know a very loving but very holy God, wonderful and yet not to be trifled with.

I hope that someday you'll share my experience; it is the joy of my existence. But even if you don't, have a good life. And rest assured that on the great and terrible Day of the Lord, you'll know that I've told you the truth these last five years.

Come on; you really didn't expect me to say anything less in my last column, did you?

University, where he completed his doctorate in entomology.

Earlier this year, in November, Carde was awarded the Chancellor's Medal for Distinguished Faculty Lecturers.

English Professor James Tate has been previously recognized for his work.

"It's always nice to know that others appreciate your work," said Tate, the recipient of two National Literary Anthology Awards.

A graduate of Kansas State University, with a master's in fine arts from Iowa State University, Tate has authored 14 books of poetry, including Reckoner and Riven Doggeries.

Tate was still a student when he received his first award for poetry, the Yale Series of Younger Poets Award, at the age of 22.

Both professors said the state's current budget crisis is diminishing the quality of education UMass students receive.

"I love working with my students," Tate said. "And it gives me a feeling of sadness, that they [state politicians] are backing away from their commitment to education."

"Massachusetts has always had a reputation for quality education," Carde said. "But now the number of classes is going down and class sizes are increasing, and that's bound to have an effect."

Carde said he felt the effects of the budget crisis first-hand. His laboratory in the basement of Hatch Laboratory is undergoing renovation, and no money has been allocated for the project to be completed.

"The cuts are not being evenly placed and that means that certain departments will be more severely hit than others," Carde said.

It took Galileo 16 years to master the universe. You have one night.

It seems unfair. The genius had all that time. While you have a few short hours to learn your sun spots from your satellites before the dreaded astronomy exam.

On the other hand, Vivarin gives you the definite advantage. It helps keep you awake and mentally alert for hours. Safely and conveniently. So even when the subject matter's dull, your mind will stay razor sharp.

If Galileo had used Vivarin, maybe he could have mastered the solar system faster, too.

Trimming excess fat from music and the mind

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Staff

It seems my D.I.Y psycho-analysis of Drukman proved to have some foundation. I mean when he has to resort to awkward euphemisms like "testicular fortitude" and "delicates" it becomes obvious, even to the layman that he has no "balls". And this obsession with track length and 12" formats, Hey that's just wish fulfillment.

But before I drown in a vat of "Carry on-esque" innuendo I must get to the matter at hand. This is, sadly, the last of the original junkies. Thanks for all the fan mail that's been piling up in the office lately. I'm deeply touched, really. Obviously, much as I would love to, I can't reply to you all individually, so I've decided to forsake the usual, anal "best-of-the-year-so-far" round-up, and use these last few inches for one last adieu. It's been a week of farewells, first Talerman, now me. I'm sure most of you lot out there won't be shedding many tears to see either of us depart, just think: this is probably the last time that words you might have to look up in a dictionary will grace the pages of the Collegian.

When I started this column last semester I was a mere sapling of a correspondent who wanted to write about music. Now I'm writing about politics and I'm making more enemies than Manuel Noriega. But there isn't really that much difference between the two, they're both just a means to an end. They clarify each other. When Tex Perkins of the Beasts of Bourbon growls "Pig's" immortal lines "well I've made this bed of shit and now I'm gonna lie in it," I think of how capitalism in general, and America in particular has fucked up the world and is now wallowing in smug complacency, erasing its crimes from the history books, shaping its dreams to the mighty dollar, and covering over the nightmares of its reality, the seemingly infinite human misery it has imposed on the world. Always forgetting.

Complacency. The aspirations of mainstream America have one thing in common, the desire to be part of a fat-assed middle class. They grow up in luxury and demand surfeit. They surround their minds in the fat of materialism. You can see it in the music they listen to. It sounds so clean, so comfortable, a soundtrack for an ideal yuppie lifestyle - fat. There is no conflict of interest. It fattens both minds of the buyers and the pockets of record companies who distribute it. The perfect cycle of consumerism.

Walk around this campus and you'll find that students spend a hell of a lot of time exercising their bodies. No one wants to be fat in a society which places great emphasis on sport and physical fitness. Look at the ads. If you're overweight, you're made to feel very self-conscious about it. But who cares about trimming mind fat, which doesn't show, and nobody really notices because in this world image is the word and appearance is everything?

How do you do trim mind fat? Quite simple really. Instead of exercising your inalienable right to buy, skip the consumer isle and for once exercise your right to think (you do have a right to think?). Thinking incidentally means thinking for yourself. America supposedly stands for individualism and freedom of expression, and yet vacuous lame-brains still ask questions like "why can't you be normal?". Try questioning everything you have been fed so far. Is it really good for you? Or does just add to the mind fat.

Does, for example, the process of "trying to learn something" at college entail pleasing profs and getting good grades, making yourself a viable and attractive commodity for industry and big business. Or perhaps you should be doing your best to destroy this education system which feeds individuals into the insanely spinning wheels of "progress" so that they come out so much unidentifiable mush at the other end. The same, incidentally, applies to music.

Or how about the fact that education in any case in the US is a priviledge, not a right. I go to college for free. So do kids in Canada. You could too if your stupid government didn't waste so many trillions of dollars trying to find more efficient ways to kill people.

Understand that the decisions you make may affect the lives of other people in countries you may never have heard of. Yes, you might as well wake up to the fact that there is a world outside the US of A, before it comes down on YOU. America's gross consumer capitalism is indirectly responsible for famine in Africa and other parts of the developing world (Destruction of rainforests causes global warming causes drought), which, in any case, is never allowed to develop because of the vast "debts" it owes to the West, which was responsible for fucking it up in the first place.

I'm not saying America is all bad. For example, it has a rich musical heritage whose ethnic diversity is unequalled. But how much do you know about jazz, or rock'n'roll, or country, or ragtime, or blues, or zydeco, or funk, or rap? What chance do you have to learn about these and the way their development reflects social and political change and upheaval in America, when the radio is programmed with so much pap, and MTV is the babysitter of the brain. It's sad to think that more people on this campus have heard of The Hooters than John Coltrane. The culture of mainstream America, the culture we are fed, is an anti-culture, a sedative which embraces ignorance and celebrates conformity.

So there you go. A few pointers about firming up your mind. It's not enough to wear a gabardine mac and have an unusual haircut. Turn off the TV. Read. Question. Educate. And above all, seek things out for yourself. Don't blindly follow anyone for the sake of acceptance, whether it be your friends or your parents.

Despite what you may think, you cannot buy a life, you can only live one. And if living in ignorance, swapping the potentially vast range of experience life has to offer for a big house, nice car and cool stereo is your idea of bliss, then so be it. But I'll tell you something. When I saw a couple of the UMass hunger strikers after they had come off the strike, believing they had won a significant victory over the administration by getting suspended students reinstated, I was overwhelmed by their vitality and excitement at the fact they had achieved something of worth.

Well things may have changed since those heady, euphoric moments of triumph, but these courageous individuals have at least proven that student protest can effect change and they have made a mockery of Duffey's heavy-handed authoritarian tactics. They should be an example to us all.

And what's more, their action had the dual effect of trimming fat from both mind and body. Now who could ask for more than that.

To All the Participants in the Teach-out:

The Graduate Employee Organization Coordinating Committee thanks you for your participation in the Teach-out. By coming to Whitmore on May 1 or May 2, you demonstrated that what we do, whether we are TA's or students, is important. You showed that teaching and learning are our jobs at the University and that our jobs have a dignity not recognized by budget slashers in Boston and not sufficiently addressed by those in Whitmore.

So accustomed are we to being on the bottom of the pile at UMass, we often forget that we are its foundation--reason it exists. Yet when money is tight or non-existent we are the ones compelled to dig deeply into almost empty pockets to make up the deficit. Critics will ask us if our demonstration resulted in an improved University budget for fiscal year 1990. The answer to that is clearly, "No." But, if the Teach-out, by bringing us together in such large numbers, reminded us of the disparity between how we are treated and what we do, then it was a success.

German thrash metallions invade states via MTV Tour

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

In Europe, almost everyone is familiar with the incredible West German metal group, Helloween. Unfortunately, the same cannot be said in America. This progressive metal group remains a mystery to most American fans. So perhaps with the success of their recent tour with Anthrax and Exodus, the departure of one of their founding members, and the current release of their EP, I Want Out, maybe it is time to uncover the mystery of Helloween.

Helloween was formed in 1978, when guitarist Kai Hansen made the decision to become a serious musician and jumped into the Hamburg club scene. After many different names and musicians, the name Helloween was chosen, and Hansen found guitarist Michael Weikath, bassist Marcus Grosskopf, and drummer Ingo Schwichtenberg. Soon after, they were signed onto their present record company, Noise International. In 1984 they released their first EP, Judas, and a year later released their first LP, Walls of Jericho.

Deciding to take a new direction with their music, the group wanted to find a proper lead singer for their future projects. They were soon to find Michael Kiske and released the concept album, Keeper of the Seven Keys, Part One, in 1987. They followed this up in 1988 with Keeper of the Seven Keys, Part Two.

Perhaps the most shocking news in metal this year was the departure of Kai Hansen from Helloween. But this has not set back the group one bit. They found Roland Grapow to replace Hansen. Asked if Hansen's departure was bitter, guitarist Michael Weikath responded, "No, it was a good break. He really can't stand the helter skelter going on with all this business. He's more of a private guy. There may have been musical differences, but they really didn't matter that much. I think the main reason that he left was the stress from touring, even though we don't tour that much."

Progression means change and it can definitely be said that Helloween is a progressive band. It's great to see that there are still groups like this one who are constantly changing their style. They have moved from the thrashiness of Judas and Walls of Jericho, to the artistic complexity of Keeper of the Seven Keys. Weikath explained, "On the first two releases we did exaggerated things to prove we are good on our instruments, but we didn't prove that we've also got a lot of feeling. There has always got to be progress and development and I feel that is what's going on now with us."

There is an obvious difference between American and European audiences. Giving his insight on this difference, Weikath commented, "In Europe, if people like heavy metal, then they only go to metal shows. If they like pop, then they only go to pop shows. In the states, people, except maybe some of the people who listen to thrash, are more open. With most thrashers, if you don't play what they want to hear, they get all pissed off. I don't understand that. But the only thing I find wrong with Americans is that they don't inform themselves. They would rather have the TV tell them what to buy than making informed decisions by themselves."

According to Weikath, Helloween hopes to "conquer America like we have conquered Europe." Being a part of the MTV Headbanger's Ball Tour with Anthrax and Exodus may accomplish this aspiration. Asked about why MTV decided to include them in this tour, Weikath replied, "MTV had heard of us and they liked us. They're pretty informed about what's happening on the international music scene. We are happy about this tour. Now people here will know what we are doing. I always hear people say that MTV will do a lot of promotion for this tour and that's exactly what we need."

Judging from the barrage of commercials on MTV, Helloween is receiving a lot of publicity. Hopefully this visiblity will work out well for the group and there will no longer be a mystery about Helloween.

Court rejects newspaper bid to see document

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court has rejected an appeal by a Massachusetts newspaper barred from seeing a court document during a much-publicized murder prosecution.

The justices, without comment yesterday, let stand a state court decision that keeping the document secret did not violate the public's constitutional right of access in criminal trials. There was no recorded dissent.

Raymond Green, a supervisor at the Belchertown State School in rural western Massachusetts, was murdered on the school campus Aug. 4, 1986. There was no arrest in the case for 11 months.

Kenneth Phoenix, a school employee, was arrested July 3, 1987, on murder charges. State police searched Phoenix's Belchertown home that same day.

After Phoenix was arraigned in court, but before he was formally indicted, a reporter for the Transcript-Telegram, a newspaper published by Newspapers of New England Inc. in Holyoke, Mass., asked to see the search warrant and supporting police affidavit.

A state judge agreed to release the warrant that was issued allowing police to search Phoenix's home. But she impounded the 16-page affidavit, in which police offered justification for the search.

A state appeals court upheld that order after the Transcript-Telegram appealed, and the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled last Dec. 22 that the judge had acted properly.

Although acknowledging the affidavit is a public document and the public has a right to attend criminal trials, the state court said: "The affidavit in question has no integral relationship with any particular pretrial proceeding to which the public enjoys a First Amendment right to access."

The state court also said releasing the affidavit at the time the newspaper sought it could have jeopardized Phoenix's right to a fair trial.

"No constitutionally guaranteed right to access to the affidavit existed at the time the plaintiff requested it, and the district court judge did not abuse her discretion in impounding the affidavit," the state court ruled.

Noting that Phoenix already had been convicted by the time of its ruling, the state Supreme Judicial Court ordered that the affidavit be make public. It subsequently was released.

In the appeal acted on today, lawyers for the newspaper said release of the document did not make its constitutional challenge moot.

Thesis project combines fine art and technology

In her MFA thesis show at Herter Gallery, Lynn Pocock-Williams unites what has often been the two separate camps of fine arts and computer graphics. She successfully evokes an emotional response from her viewers through her analysis of music and image-matching. Some of the videos employ a more "traditional" approach to animation, where Pocock-Williams listens to the music (written and performed by R. Stuart Williams) and creates an animation using the computer to assist only in the process of movement of forms, while reserving for herself all the decisions about which forms will be used and how. But for the two generated videos, First Generation and Next Generation, "the computer graphics imagery was automatically generated by the computer through the use of rule system technology. This generation process allowed the music information to be read into the computer and then analyzed. Next, decisions were made to determine which visuals best expressed the emotional content of the music. Finally, visuals were generated (by the computer) and recorded onto video tape along with the corresponding music."

The series opens with Virtual Reality, a compelling, complex piece both visually and musically. There is an unsettling urgency in this piece achieved though the insistent nature of the music and heightened by the tension between the music and the slow, gliding forms: This tension is paralleled in the presence of guitar strings in the video image that is alternately revealed and concealed by the geometric forms. Pocock-Williams captivates her audience throughout this sequence of works with a technique she developed in her 1987 video, Stairs. In this technique, she uses a very mysterious video image as a central figure. In Virtual Reality, it is an image of a guitarist's torso and hand, and the guitar's neck, which are visible only because they are illuminated by a second video image projected in a circular format onto the player's torso. The projection at first appears to be some sort of moving clouds, until a human figure is seen surfing across the guitarist's chest. The other pictorial elements bring this strange video image into focus through their movement around, over, and through it. In The Next Generation, the central video figure is a banner-like misty pink and blue rectangle that is actually a stain painting.

This is not the only reference Pocock-Williams makes to tradition fine arts media. In Homage to Kandinsky she pays tribute to the structure and construction of a Kandinsky painting. Rather than using the entire screen, she limits the piece to a smaller rectangular area, referring to the familiar format of a painting on a wall. The black and white picture begins building itself with the various geometric forms that can be found in Kandinsky's paintings. This process continues, as new forms completely obliterate the old, revising the piece in an obvious analogy to the revisions a painting goes through. The introduction of a shape with pulsing colors speaks of the living quality of a Kandinsky painting: the heartbeat, the breath.

Unlike any of the other videos, the music for this piece was written specifically for it.

The First Generation and The Next Generation both contain imagery that was actually generated by the computer. There is a somewhat subversive quality running underneath the music which is, at times, reminiscent of spy-film music. The First Generation is about the interplay of diagonal forms, whereas The Next Generation uses horizontal and vertical bands and bars, forming grids and playing with after-images. Both of these have a strong formal appeal along the lines of Norm McLaren and Sol LeWitt: They entice you to stay and try to 'solve' them as the music provides a soul-feeding emotional base.

Pocock-Williams leaves interpretation entirely up to the viewer. Unlike some work that is more narrative in content, she gives you the freedom to bring whatever you want to her pieces, and to take with you your own personal associates. While some issues are clear, others are complex and allow for multiplicity of readings. But above all, she provides a profoundly innovative aesthetic experience what is wholistic, addressing the logical, intellectual side of her viewers as well as the emotional and spiritual sides.

Earth Girls mindless fun

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Earth Girls Are Easy
Mt. Farms Four Theaters

There's like, this totally rad movie out. It's full of totally cool, colorful, overblown sets, and takes place in the San Fernando Valley. The Movie is Earth Girls Are Easy, and it's lots of fun. This is one of those rare gems that not only knows it's stupid, it thrives on it.

Directed by the slick Julien (Absolute Beginners) Temple, the flick stars Geena (Accidental Tourist) Davis, a manicurist at the Curl Up and Dye beauty salon, and eater of all-natural, low-cal Pop Tarts, who just broke up with her fiance (and bowled over his Commodore computer) after she caught him playing "Dr. Love" with a nurse.

When a spaceship, which Davis first mistakes for a giant blow dryer, lands in her swimming pool, the rowdiness begins. Three fuzzy aliens come out, and Davis brings them to her hair salon where co-worker Julie Brown (singer of "Homecoming Queen's Got a Gun", not the MTV vj) shaves off their bright fur and turns them into the three hunks Jim Carrey, Damon Wayans, and Jeff (The Fly) Goldblum.

Davis and Goiblum (real life husband and wife) immediately fall for each other, as Brown takes the other two sex-starved aliens clubbing. The aliens do not speak English, but have a great knack for copying speech and mannerisms. They learn from TV and nightclubs. Yes, it's been done a million times before, but this time the results are actually funny. "Are we limp and hard to manage?" Goldblum asks Davis.

Temple, who has a tendency to go way over budget on his films, pulls out all the stops for this one. He seems to have a certain fondness for the tackiness of the Hollywood area. Each scene is filled with hot pinks, glitzy neons, and every florescent color in the spectrum.

The musical numbers are wonderfully overdone, campy productions in the same vein as John Water's Hairspray. "Because I'm a Blonde" ("I want to become a veterinarian because I like to work with children.") may be the all out funniest song ever acted out.

The acting is also superb, or as superb as acting can be in a movie such as this. Although Davis and Goldblum occasionally slip out of their respective valley girl and alien accents, they pull off their roles convincingly. Julie Brown (who co-wrote the script) is a natural in her big screen debut. And Michael McKean - Lenny from Laverne and Shirley - is riotous as the surfer boy pool cleaner who brings aliens Carrey and Wayans to a beach for blondes only.

Before you go thinking that this film is another Valley Girl or Bill and Ted's Excellent Adventure, think again. Unlike those films, Temple is out to show you just how shallow and downright stupid Valley people are. His message is that as long as you look good, know a couple of dance moves, a few good (or bad) pick-up lines, or have a really long tongue, you'll fit right in, even if you're from another planet.

So if you're feeling overwhelmed by finals, give your tired brain a couple of hours off, and just sit back and enjoy the brilliantly mindless humor of this bitchin' flick.

However, Cornell isn't going to just blow away in the wind. The Big Red is a traditionally tough team in the playoffs, so tomorrow's game could be as much of a grapple as the last three.

Here is a look back at UMass-Cornell in the last two years:

March 29 — Cornell 12, UMass 11:

The Gorillas returned from their California trip unbeaten and unchallenged, but the Big Red gave them a rude welcome back East. UMass came from behind on five occasions, but could never pull into the lead. Tim Soudan tied the game at 11-11 with 7:42 left before John Snow's goal with 5:27 left put Cornell up for good.

Soudan had four goals to lead UMass, while Codignotto added three.

May 18, 1988 — Cornell 13, UMass 11 (NCAA First Round):

UMass came in as the tourney's sixth seed, facing a Cornell team that, at 6-5 had just barely made the field. UMass pulled into a 6-5 halftime lead before a 4-1 Cornell third-period surge put the visitors up, 9-7. UMass couldn't close the gap and was eliminated by the eventual tournament runner-up.

March 30, 1988 — UMass 8, Cornell 7 (five overtimes):

In one of the greatest games in UMass history, Soudan ended nearly 20 minutes of extra play by picking up a loose ball and rifling it home with 2:41 left in the fifth extra session.

Jamie Bergan had tied the game with 1:20 left in regulation. Goalie Sal LoCascio played tough in OT, finishing with 28 saves.

percentage above .900 and Kevin Correa flirted with a sub-.800 percentage all season.

"We knew we had some holes," said Stone, "and they were exploited."

Another trouble spot was hitting, not in general, but clutch hitting.

"I was disappointed with it," Stone admitted. "We had lots of chances, especially with people on base and we just didn't produce." This lack of timely hitting spoiled some impressive pitching performances by Minutemen throwers.

Paul Ciaglo lost a no-hitter, 1-0 to the University of Rhode Island, and teammate Brian Conroy suffered the same fate after pitching a masterful one-hitter against Temple University.

"Our pitching was good," Stone said. "We got some great performances during the season out of our staff. It was very solid."

Stone's general feelings were ones of relief that the season had come to an end and optimism about starting another season next spring.

"I'm really excited about next year," said Stone. "We have nine excellent players coming in, along with some walk-ons and some transfers. I feel good about the players we have returning. I'm looking forward to starting again."

a winning throw of 46.66 meters, or 153 feet, 1 inch.

"I knew she had it in her all the time, but she finally did it," said head coach Julie LaFreniere. "She had a great series [of throws] and she dominated the field. She had several throws in the 150's and she really stepped up to the competition."

Ambrose, who ran well all season, finally broke the school record with a run of 55.32 seconds. "Basically, Lee Ann has been running comfortably," said LaFreniere. "She wasn't pressed by anybody in New England, but after ECACs, she was in pain."

LaFreniere is extremely pleased with her program this year — for the only the second time, UMass has an ECAC champion. "I think it's a great way to wrap up the season with a 1-2 performance in the ECACs," said LaFreniere. "It was very emotional down there, and I was ready to cry for both of them."

■ men's track

The New England Championship was the last meet of the year for the men, who will not be in action until the indoor season next winter.

Academy back into it's own lane, but Coast Guard took it's time getting back. UMass filed a written protest, but the judges, with their infinite wisdom, disregarded it. Thus forcing UMass to race in the petite finals. They finished eighth out of twenty-one crews.

The varsity heavyweight four was quite successful, after a dismal regular season. They made it all the way to the semifinals before being eliminated. There are no petite finals for the heavyweight division. Both novice boats were eliminated in the quarterfinals.

CELEBRATE DIVERSITY

The retaining wall opposite the east entrance of the Campus Center will soon be the site of a mural to commemorate last year's Civility Week and create a permanent message that addresses the importance of continued civility awareness and progress. The idea for a civility mural came from Environmental Design major Jon Satz. A competition among students in the Art, Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning, and Afro-American Studies departments was conducted by the Arts Council, the Graduate Art Students Association (GASA,) and UARTS, the Art Department's undergraduate art students organization. Design proposals were juried by students from the Art and Landscape Architecture departments and the Third World Caucus, faculty, and staff. The design of a graduate art student, Jonathan Kohrman, was selected. He will start to paint the mural in early May. A series of scenes will depict University community members from many constituencies socializing, working, and learning together. University members may actually serve as models for some of the figures in the mural. During its creation we encourage you to stop and speak with the artist.

For further information, contact the Arts Council, 125 Herter Hall, 545-0202.

Men's lacrosse is seeing Red; gears up for Cornell

Gorillas want revenge

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The calm has followed the storm, in a way, for the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

After the Gorillas spent most of Sunday night grumbling about their placement in the postseason tournament, their attention yesterday shifted to the matter at hand.

Cornell University comes to Amherst tomorrow, for the second time this year, as opposition for UMass in the first round of the NCAA lacrosse tournament. This is also the fourth time the teams have butted heads in the last two seasons, and the third game in a row here at UMass.

Cornell has won the last two meetings, including an upset win in the first round of last year's tournament and a win in the home opener this year. UMass would like nothing better than to reverse this string of bad luck against the Big Red.

"I think we can blow 'em out," said junior attack Scott Hiller. "We should have beat them the last time."

"Revenge," said junior attack Rob Codignotto.

If anything, the early-season loss keeps the Gorillas' attention focused on just this one game. It would be easy to look ahead to a possible trip to Baltimore (Sunday to face second-seeded Johns Hopkins), but UMass wants nothing more than to smack Cornell around a little bit.

Also, a win would do a world of good for the confidence of a team which has had a poor playoff history. The Gorillas have made the tournament seven times since its inception in 1971, but have won just once, over the University of New Hampshire in 1986. UMass went on to lose in the quarterfinal that year to Hopkins.

With that, UMass is just 1-7 through in the postseason and has made it to the quarterfinal round just once (1986). And the Gorillas are still pretty upset about the NCAA's lack of regard for their abilities this year. So they are chomping at the bit to show the lax experts a thing or five.

Postseason times, places, and costs

The University of Massachusetts will be throwing a big postseason party this week.

Sunday night, the men's lacrosse team learned that it will be hosting Cornell in the first round of the NCAA tournament. It was announced yesterday that the game will be at 4 p.m. tomorrow at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Also, the softball team will be hosting the Northeast Regionals of the NCAA tourney Friday and Saturday at Totman Field. UMass, Connecticut and Oregon (Northeast?) will play a double elimination tourney those two days for a trip to California for the nationals.

Tickets for the lax game are $4 for adults and $2 for children under 12. No UMass IDs will be honored. Tickets for the softball game are also $4, but senior citizens, children under 12 and students with an ID can get in for $2.

Track teams vary in postseason results

● Ambrose and Desantis take home the hardware

By RICK SETO

At the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Championships this weekend, there was a contrast of sceneries on the University of Massachusetts women's track team. There was senior Carla DeSantis, who was winding down her four-year collegiate athletic career, and on the other hand, there was freshman Lee Ann Ambrose, who was only completing her first season. While one was being ushered out the door and the other just getting through, both competed to form a 1-2 punch, with DeSantis winning the javelin and Ambrose coming in second in the 400-meter dash.

The duo scored a total of 18 points for UMass (10 from winner DeSantis and eight from runner-up Ambrose). They were the only scorers for the Minutewomen, as Amy St. Pierre, Helen Balaouras, and Tina White did not place in the top six scoring places.

DeSantis had been throwing less than what anybody expected, but she was still placing in the top three in competitions throughout the year. But when it came time to step up and throw against the cream of the crop in Fairfax, VA, she rose to the occasion and bested everyone with

● Minutemen end on a disappointing note; 12th

By ROB SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's track team wound up its season this past weekend in Durham, N.H. at the New England Track Championships. UMass sent 17 athletes to compete with the best in New England, but the Minutemen turned in a disappointing performance, with only three athletes getting into the scoring column for UMass. The men tied Maine for 12th place with 18 points.

Herb Heffner placed the highest for UMass, with a 2nd place finish in the 3,000 meter steeplechase. His time of 9:06.63 was his best time of the season. Fitzpatrick Hagan of UMass also posted his best time of the season in the steeplechase, taking 4th in 9:11.35.

Minuteman Steve Brown took 3rd in the quarter mile in 48.8. Brown also placed 3rd in Easterns the previous weekend.

The only other UMass athlete to have a notable performance was Jeff White, who placed 7th in the 110 high hurdles with a time of 16.79, more than a one-second drop off his personal best time of 15.51 at Easterns.

Crew teams dominate the Nationals in Philly

By C.J. ABATI
Collegian Staff

This past weekend, the University of Massachusetts crew team participated in the Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia, Pa. The race took place on the Schuylkill River and is the largest collegiate regatta in the world. This year's race, the fifty-first running, is considered the Division II National Championships, even though it is not sanctioned by the NCAA. Since the NCAA is not involved, small crews from all over the country are invited to compete for the honor of being the best.

Competitive teams always dream of winning the National Title. The UMass varsity women's crew team came darn close to fulfilling that dream. The women won the silver medal for their division. But they are the best team in the country, as the Western Ontario crew won the gold. They finished six seconds or about¾ of a length ahead of UMass.

"I'm really pleased with their finish. They worked hard all year, they deserve it," said coach Dave Trond.

"The finishes were real decisive. When you get this far in the finals, with the caliber of these teams, everything is a big win," exclaimed Trond.

The men's squad was also successful over the weekend. Their top boat, the lightweight eight, finished second in the petite final, which is eighth overall.

Coast Guard rowed into the UMass lane, forcing it to row out of it's own lane. Race officials ordered the

A frustrating year for UM baseball

Fielding the problems

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Staff

After the success of the University of Massachusetts baseball team during the 1988 season, many people had very high hopes for the Minutemen this year.

Despite losing seven key players to graduation and Major League Baseball's amatuer draft, UMass kept some talent and had many young players coming in, people who could make a serious impact. As a result, expectations were unlimited among the Minutemen faithful, only to be dashed during a disappointing, rollercoaster year in which UMass ended up a startling 17-27.

Among insiders, though, the year wasn't such a suprise.

"We knew this season was going to be interesting," said head coach Mike Stone. "We suspected it might be a rebuilding year, and unfortunately that's what it turned out be."

Stone also felt that an injury to second baseman Dan Biagini during the Florida trip was a major factor during the rest of the season.

"When you look back on it, that cost us more than 10 games," said Stone.

He also repeated the emphasis on the lack of leadership by this year's co-captains, infielder Steve Kern and pitcher Dave Telgheder. Kern was second on the team among regular infielders in fielding percentage (.952) but behind the plate his batting average fell from .361 last year to .288 this year and his runs-batted-in total was cut in half. He also had problems off the field, getting kicked off the team twice for disciplinary reasons.

Telgheder last year compiled an 8-2 record with 3.48 earned run average but struggled this year going 2-5 with a 4.61 earned run average.

The lack of experience among the Minutemen's ranks was cause for concern at the beginning of the year, but the crop of freshmen instead turned out to be a bright spot.

"We got great performances out of our two freshman catchers, Derek Dana and Lou Olivieri," said Stone. The two combined for 21 RBIs and Olivieri was second on the team with a .342 batting average and third in doubles with eight.

"Glen DiSarcina was tremendous at shortstop," Stone said. "He was unbelievable for a freshman." DiSarcina had a .901 fielding percentage and did well behind the plate, batting .280 while scoring 22 runs.

Despite the good play of the freshmen, the Minutemen struggled overall, especially in the field.

UMass finished with a team fielding percentage of .930 which won't get a team to a .500 record let alone the Atlantic 10 playoffs. The injury to Biagini showed itself as Stone had trouble finding someone to play baseball and not volleyball at second. Of the four players tried at second, not a single one had a fielding

Spring 89 full of action

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Spring at the University of Massachusetts left the campus reeling with excitement and dissension, sparked by issues ranging from state budget cutbacks to headline-grabbing demonstrations which involved five separate occupations in UMass buildings.

The University was thrust into the spotlight in April, the target of national media attention when more than 130 students and community members were arrested after occupying buildings in protest of military-funded research at UMass.

Commentary

Massachusetts state police and Town of Amherst police donned riot gear and were called to assist UMass police with the arrests. Emotion reached a feverish peak during the arrests as about 200 outside supporters attempted to block buses transporting those arrested.

The protesters demanded a halt to military-funded research and called for an alternate method of funding. The demonstrations were the largest at the University since the 1987 protests against CIA recruitment of students on campus.

University administrators balked at the protester's demands, but Chancellor Joseph Duffey said he was willing to form a committee to examine the overall United States economy to discuss alternate methods of funding.

Students, many of whom were suspended because of their actions, continued the occupations claiming the administration failed to meet their demands. Six students even launched an 8-day hunger strike to support the protesters.

Protesters and administrators are still at odds over the issue of funding, and both anticipate an active fall semester as well.

Although the occupations dominated the limelight, the University was also rocked by controversy when the Distinguished Visitord Program invited Minister Louis Farrakhan to speak at the Fine Arts Center in February.

Farrakhan, the leader of Islam, is a Black leader who advocates freedom for all Blacks and equal opportunity and justice for all regardless of ethnicity or creed.

Farrakhan's arrival prompted outcries from the Jewish community because he has been accused of making anti-semitic remarks. Many students and faculty on campus, however, said Farrakhan's message is mainly "pro-Black," not anti-semitic.

The event, which was completely sold out, started an hour late to accomodate extensive security measures both by Farrakhan and UMass police. Only a small student protest outside the FAC mobilized for the event, which many said went smoothly despite considerable student resistance in the weeks before his arrival.

A statewide campaign against budget cuts to public higher education was also launched at the semester's start, headed by former Student Trustee Stephanie Orefice.

Letters from students at colleges and universities across the state demanding support for education were sent to state legislators, who were also inundated with telephone calls paid for by UMass.

Gov. Michael Dukakis and Chairman of the Board of Regents Paul Tsongas came to UMass in February to meet with student delegates to discuss the cuts, but tempers flared when students criticized Dukakis' handling of the issue. Student leaders said little was accomplished.

Dukakis' visit marked the first construction of "Cutback City," an 11-hut village by the campus pond built to symbolize the impoverished status of public higher education.

There's more to scholars than SATs

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

In January, a federal judge ruled that the awarding of state-sponsored merit scholarships solely on the basis of the Scholastic Aptitude Test is unfairly biased against females. Only two states use these scores exclusively: New York and Massachusetts.

Terry Zoulas, public relations director of the Massachusetts Board of Regents, said the state awards $84 million in scholarships annually, $600,000 of which (0.7 percent) is awarded on the basis of SAT scores through the senatorial Honors Program. The rest of the money, Zoulas said, is given on the basis of financial need. The board oversees the awarding of these scholarships.

"We knew (the selection process) was wrong from the inception," he said. "We're looking to get rid of it. It's been going on for years."

Judge John M. Walker's decison last Friday was the first to call the SATs discriminatory, according to the New York times. The exam, usually taken by college-bound high school juniors, has also been criticized for inaccurately reflecting the aptitudes of racial minorities.

Arlene Avakian, a lecturer in the University of Massachusetts Women's Studies department, said that while males score higher on the SATs, females generally get better grades in high school.

"I'm glad to see that a test like that is labelled as discriminatory," she said. "World problems (on the SATs) relate more to a male experience as opposed to a female experience."

Univ Health provides a vital service

By DAVID R. MARK

Summer in Amherst — a time for suntanning, swimming, playing ball and eating ice cream. Except if you are outside too long in 90 degree temperatures and get heat stroke.

But before you panic and move to the Arctic Circle (or Sunderland), the University Health Services suggests some simple steps toward a safe and healthy summer.

"The problem is when someone is losing more fluids than they are taking in," said Paula Flint, a registered nurse at the UHS. "If you're outside exercising or working, you needed to take in eight to 10 glasses of fluids a day. [Students] should not be outside without fluids."

Flint said heat stroke differs from heat exhaustion. Heat exhaustion, the less dangerous of the two, occurs when the body loses fluids [through sweat], but "can still keep up with it."

Signs of heat stroke, however, include dizziness, high body temperature and not sweating, she said, adding that these students need to be cooled down immediately.

"You need to be cooled down with a wet cloth, small sips of water . . . [or be] taken into the shade, because [a student's] body temperature is way up," she said. Body temperature can be as high as 105 degrees, Flint said.

Other ailments?

From sneezing to sex education, the University Health Services provides services and programs for the University of Massachusetts community, according to a work study student at the UHS.

Mary Gorman said beyond the UHS Health Center — a mini-hospital, with a pharmacy, 14 doctors, a dental clinic and a staff of nurse practitioners, physicians and assistants — the UHS provides several other programs:

- The Peer Health Program, which answers questions on summer health care, stress, and other areas that "fall between the cracks," Gorman said.
- The Peer Sexuality Education, which answers questions on sex education, AIDS, sexually transmitted diseases [STDs] and contraception.
- The Peer Alcohol and Drug Program, which deals with questions of alcohol and drug abuse.
- The Contraception Education Program, which answers questions on contraception and STDs.
- Eating disorder groups, which deal with questions on bulimia, anorexia and chronic dieting.
- The Health Education Office — a question and answer service. HEO is also the office that designs and runs programs in the residence halls.

The Health Center, including an urgent care center [which like an emergency room does not require an appointment] is open 24 hours a day, seven days a week. The health education office is open 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday. For more information, call the UHS at 549-2671.

SATs

Ronald Hambleton, a University professor of education, is researching how accurately the controversial test determines the range of a student's knowledge. Hambleton said high school grades are an equally unreliable basis for judgment because the grade a student receives at a given high school depends on the quality of education offered there.

"On the average," he said, "females are less likely to take advanced-level math courses than males."

Still, Hambleton agreed that the scholarship selection process is discriminatory and said that the state is putting together its own aptitude test.

Said Hambleton: "How can you have any procedure that gives 80 percent of its awards to males?"

George Urch, associate dean of the University's School of Education, said, "the exam is a poor indicator of a lot of things." Urch said standardized examinations like the SATs and the Graduate Record Examination not reflect six important aspects of the student's total knowledge: perseverance, motivation, effort, confidence, leadership and how the student assumes responsibility.

According to the National Education Association 1989 Almanac of Higher Education, the average SAT scores of female college-bound seniors was 422, verbal, 453, math, while the average male scores were 435, verbal, 498, math.

Hambleton said the tests are geographically inaccurate as well. Massachusetts, he said, is ranked 39 in the nation for SAT scores. However, 60 to 70 percent of this state's high school students take the exam. In states like Alabama, where only tow percent of the students take the exam, there is less competition, he said.

While questions arise as to the validity of awarding the scholarships, Associate Dean of Admission Kathy Reinhart said "academic record has the top priority; in the University's applicant selection process. "We look at a lot more than that, though."

Zoulas said the state plans to award scholarships on the basis of more aspects of a student's high school education: class rank, grades and extracurricular activities will all be considered for the program.

"You don't give merit awards on the basis of a single test," he said. "It's educationally unsound."

Men's basketball signs another recruit

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The recruiting class of 1989 continues to grow for th University of Massachusetts men's basketball team.

On May 10, head coach John Calipari announced that he had signed his fifth recruit, 6-foot-7, 205-pound Harper Williams of Bridgeport, Conn., to a letter of intent to play for the Minutemen next season.

Calipari said he believes Williams will be an impact player for the Minuteman right away.

"He's a good player. He's a better player than an athlete in that he knows what to do on the floor," Calipari said. "He's more like [sophomore guard] Anton Brown than [sophomore forward] Jimmy McCoy in that respect."

Assistant coach John Robic said he thinks Williams is the best of this year's recruiting class.

Williams was named Co-Mr. Basketball for the state of Connecticut this past season along with teammate Jerome Johnson. He played for coach Harrison Taylor at Bassick High school, which he led to a 26-0 season, the State Class L Championship and a national ranking of eight by USA Today.

This past season at Bassick, Williams averaged 25.0 points and 14.0 rebounds a game, and he scored 1,207 points for his career. He was named first team All-State and was an honorable mention All-American by Street and Smith magazine.

He was also named the MVP of the Connecticut Jewish Community Center All-Star game and played in the New Haven Shootout.

Williams was also recruited by Seton Hall University, the University of Connecticut, the University of Hartford, the University of Rhode Island, Boston University and Central Connecticut State University.

But Calipari credits the work of assistant coach Bill Bayno for Williams' decision to come to UMass.

"Rhode Island really wanted him. Billy Bayno did a nice job. He really got in good with the people [at Bassick]," Calipari said. "[Williams] also had a good visit here."

UMass also had another small factor on its side. Williams is the cousin of Charlie Smith, a forward for the NBA Los Angeles Clippers. Smith played at the University of Pittsburgh when Calipari was an assistant coach there.

Williams will join previous signees Tony barbee, a 6-6 forward from Indianapolis, 6-6 Tom Pace of Denver, 6-9 Kennard Robinson of the Bronx, and 6-10 Gary Hughes of Naugatuck, Conn., as incoming freshmen for next year's team. They hope to help a 10-18 UMass team reach the top of the Atlantic 10. According to Calipari, the road to success may begin with this year's freshmen recruits.

"This gives us a real solid class for next year," Calipari said.

PALAZZI HANDS OFF TO SMELLIE — The football team finished 8-4 in 1988, winning the Yankee Conference and earning a playoff spot against Eastern Kentucky State University in the Division 1-AA playoffs. UMass lost, however, but hopes a solid freshmen recruiting class will aid them toward another successful year in 1989.

SO CLOSE — The UMass men's lacrosse team finished 13-3, earning a spot in the playoffs. In a first-round battle against Cornell, they were victorious, 16-7, but they succumbed to No. 2 ranked Johns Hopkins University, 9-4.

Frustrating UM baseball season ends

Stone to look for answers after painful 17-27 year

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Staff

After the success of the University of Massachusetts baseball team during the 1988 season, many people had very high hopes for the Minutemen this year.

Despite losing seven key players to graduation and Major League Baseball's amateur draft, UMass kept some talent and had many young players coming in, people who could make a serious impact. As a result, expectations were unlimited among the Minutemen faithful, only to be dashed during a disappointing, rollercoaster year in which UMass ended up a startling 17-27.

Among insiders, though, the year wasn't such a surprise.

"We knew this season was going to be interesting," said head coach Mike Stone. "We suspected it might be a rebuilding year, and unfortunately that's what it turned out be."

Stone also felt that an injury to second baseman Dan Biagini during the Florida trip was a major factor during the rest of the season.

"When you look back on it, that cost us more than 10 games," said Stone.

He also repeated the emphasis on the lack of leadership by this year's co-captains, infielder Steve Kern and pitcher Dave Telgheder. Kern was second on the team among regular infielders in fielding percentage (.952) but behind the plate his batting average fell from .361 last year to .288 this year and his runs-batted-in total was cut in half. He also had problems off the field, getting kicked off the team twice for disciplinary reasons.

Telgheder last year compiled an 8-2 record with 3.48 earned run average but struggled this year, going 2-5 with a 4.61 ERA.

The lack of experience among the Minutemen's ranks was cause for concern at the beginning of the year, but the crop of freshmen instead turned out to be a bright spot.

"We got great performances out of our two freshman catchers, Derek Dana and Lou Olivieri," said Stone. The two combined for 21 RBIs and Olivieri was second on the team with a .342 batting average and third in doubles with eight.

"Glen DiSarcina was tremendous at shortstop," Stone said. "He was unbelievable for a freshman." DiSarcina had a .901 fielding percentage and did well behind the plate, batting .280 while scoring 22 runs.

Despite the good play of the freshmen, the Minutemen struggled overall, especially in the field.

UMass finished with a team fielding percentage of .930 which won't get a team to a .500 record let alone the Atlantic 10 playoffs. The injury to Biagini showed itself as Stone had trouble finding someone to play baseball and not volleyball at second. Of the four players tried at second, not a single one had a fielding percentage above .900 and Kevin Correa flirted with a sub-.800 percentage all season.

"We knew we had some holes," said Stone, "and they were exploited."

Another trouble spot was hitting, not in general, but clutch hitting.

"I was disappointed with it," Stone admitted. "We had lots of chances, especially with people on base and we just didn't produce." This lack of timely hitting spoiled some impressive pitching performances by Minutemen throwers.

Paul Ciaglo lost a no-hitter, 1-0, to the University of Rhode Island, and teammate Brian Conroy suffered the same fate after pitching a masterful one-hitter against Temple University.

"Our pitching was good," Stone said. "We got some great performances during the season out of our staff. It was very solid."

Stone's general feelings were ones of relief [that the season had ended] and optimism about starting another season next spring.

"I'm really excited about next year," said Stone. "We have nine excellent players coming in, along with some walk-ons and some transfers. I feel good about the players we have returning. I'm looking forward to starting again."

Spring is a fine season for Aprile

By SAM SILVERSTEIN

Holly Aprile looked like she'd just taken a left hook from Sugar Ray Leonard. The trainers hurried to stop up the blood flowing from a gash above her right eye, as her fellow University of Massachusetts softball teammates snuck nervous glances at the scene.

In the first game of their late March homecoming against top-ranked Princeton and arch-rival University of Connecticut, the Minutewomen had apparently lost the services of their starting pitcher on a freak foul ball that went astray.

One hour — and five fresh stitches — later, Aprile was on the mound against the Huskies, grimacing her way through eight innings of four-hit ball. UMass won 2-1, and Aprile awoke the next morning with a blinding shiner and Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week honors.

"That confirmed my belief," recalled UMass coach Elaine Sortino, "that Holly is an animal. She's like a kamikaze kid the way she plays the game."

Aprile will be a sophomore this fall. As a freshman, she has been the catalyst for last spring's youth-heavy softball squad, leading the Minetwomen into the playoffs and to a surprisingly successful season.

Going into the playoffs, Aprile was a whopping 20-9, with an ERA of 1.22. She'd won 14 of her previous 15 decisions, and on the year has collected nine shutouts. Meanwhile, Aprile has batted .279, and lead the team in runs, hits and RBIs.

Aprile shuts up when asked to describe the contents of her trophy case, saying "I don't think about those thinks . . . please don't write about that stuff." That would leave a lot of empty space, however.

She's been named A-10 Pitcher of the Week four times, and recently became the first player in the history of that award to win both it and Player of the Week at the same time.

At Afton (N.Y.) High School, Aprile lettered in field hockey and basketball (for which she was named to the Binghamton area All-Metro team), and in four years of varsity softball, Afton never finished lower than thrid place in the state tournament. She tossed 32 no-hitters and 44 shurouts in her career, while compiling a record of 87-8.

The numbers pretty much speak for themselves, but Aprile's attitude cannot be measured by box scores and media guides. She is aggressive and competitive on a softball diamond, almost dangerously so.

"I'm not trying to set an example or anything . . . everybody on our team is that way, you just accept it and you play," she said.

Besides adding a rising fastball to her standard straight heater, she said, "I have work to do on my batting, in being more disciplined at the plate."

Not that anyone's complaining, of course. "I'm just glad she's on my side," said Sortino. "I like her right the way she is."
